SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1910.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an item of additional estimates for urgent deficiencies in the appropriations required for the service of the District of Columbia for the current fiscal year, $1,304.30 (S. Doc. No. 326), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, a statement showing the estimated total areas of public lands disposed of in Arkansas under the various acts of Congress, together with the gross proceeds arising from public-land sales in the State of Arkansas from July 1, 1836, to June 30, 1909, etc., which was read.

Mr. DAVIS. In connection with the communication just laid before the Senate I desire to offer a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Public Lands, proposing to give that committee the power to investigate the condition of the accounts beween the Government and the State of Arkansas. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 153) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 153.

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Interior in response to Senate resolution No. 140 be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and that they are hereby authorized to investigate fully the condition of the accounts between the Government and the State of Arkansas.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16223) extending the time for certain homesteaders to establish residence upon their lands.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14464) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, and Mr. BURLESON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17500) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. GRAFF, and Mr. SHERLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13915) to establish in the Department of the Interior a bureau of mines, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 506. An act authorizing a credit in certain accounts of the Treasurer of the United States;

S. 4089. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River and to establish it as a post-road;

H. R. 13831. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 15387. An act authorizing the town of Bass Brook to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River, in Itasca County, Minn.; and

H. R. 16223. An act extending the time for certain homesteaders to establish residence upon their lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KEAN presented a petition of the Master Painters' Association of Newark, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or mislabeled paint, turpentine, or linseed oil, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Paterson, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

He also presented a memorial of Gloucester County Pomona Grange, No. 8, Patrons of Husbandry, of Mullica Hill, N. J., and a memorial of Local Grange No. 51, Patrons of Husbandry, of Mullica Hill, N. J., remonstrating against the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Newark, N. J., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Montclair, N. J., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the American Association of State Geologists, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a bureau of mines in the Interior Department, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented a petition of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States, praying for the enactment of legislation to reform the reorganized consular service of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Mattoon, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOURNE. I present a petition signed by C. J. Trenchard, J. Q. A. Bowlby, and 250 other residents of Clatsop County, Oreg., asking for the creation of a national park whose boundaries will include Saddle and Humbug mountains. I ask that the petition, together with nine photographs and the printed description of the proposed park, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for consideration in connection with Senate bill 5629, introduced by my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and which has been referred to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS presented a paper to accompany the bill (S. 3741) for the relief of the heirs of John J. Johnson, deceased, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of the Nebraska State Board of Agriculture, of Lincoln, Nebr., praying that an annual appropriation be made in aid of the agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a petition of Logan Post, No. 177, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, of Logan, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called "National Tribune pension bill," which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Leavenworth, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a paper to accompany the bill (S. 3836) to amend an act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the civil war and the war with Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented a memorial of the Corn Belt Meat Producers' Association, of Des Moines, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of any legislation which would tend to lessen the authority and power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Volunteer Retired List Association of Des Moines County, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to create a volunteer retired list in the War and Navy departments for the surviving officers of the civil war, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Monday Afternoon Club, of Fort Madison, Iowa, remonstrating against the destruction of the scenery of the Yosemite National Park, and also against the enactment of legislation permitting the city of San Francisco to use the waters of the Hetch Hetchy Valley, which was referred to the Committee on Conservation of National Resources.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Swea City, Iowa, remonstrating against the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculutre and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Milton, Marion, Kenwood, Pulaski, Greensburg, and Cedar Rapids, all in the State of Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the rate of postage on periodicals, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Odebolt, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1035) authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to examine and settle the claim of the Wales Island Packing Company, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 116) thereon.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6043) for the relief of registers and former registers of the United States land offices, to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims. The subject-matter of the bill does not pertain to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3983) to amend the act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 302), entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," and all amendments thereto, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 117) thereon.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DIXON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $85,000 for the erection of a hospital at Fort Missoula, Mont., intended to be proposed by him to the army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOLLIVER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $8,258.60, with interest, to pay William H. H. Hart for the care and maintenance of dependent children at the Hart Farm School, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SETTLEMENT OF NAVAL CLAIMS.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5352) to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—HEIRS OF ELISHA LOWRY.

On motion of Mr. BACON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case for the relief of the heirs of Elisha Lowry (Senate bill No. 887) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

PACKING FOR EXPORT.

Mr. BACON. There is a document which has been published by the Department of Commerce and Labor entitled "Packing for Export." It gives a great deal of valuable information as to the manner in which various products, manufactured and agricultural, shall be prepared for shipment. It is particularly interesting and important to those who are interested in the preparation of cotton for shipment. The supply has been exhausted, and I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the report of John M. Carson, Chief of the Bureau of Manufactures, Department of Commerce and Labor, submitting data regarding the packing of merchandise for export, be printed as a document, with accompanying illustrations.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 155), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 155.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee during the Sixty-first Congress, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

PRICE OF FOOD PRODUCTS ON THE FARM.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The resolution (S. Res. 154) was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Senate resolution 154.

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make a thorough investigation of the prices of food products on the farm in various parts of the United States, the wholesale prices of such food products at the wholesale trade centers of the United States, and the retail prices of such food products in the larger cities of the United States, and to report to the Senate at the earliest possible date, such report to contain also a comparative statement showing cost of production on the farm, the cost of transportation to the trade centers, and the cost and expense of handling such food products by the retail dealers; and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to visit the larger trade centers of the United States for the purpose of securing this information, and to appoint such clerical assistance as may be necessary, to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and hold such hearings as may be deemed necessary; and that the expense of such investigation be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved and signed by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there was introduced in the House yesterday a bill to remove the protection from beef cattle imported into the United States. This comes as a result of the agitation which has grown out of the higher price of food products. I have maintained right along that the exorbitantly high price of those products was not due to any extent to the price that was received by the producers themselves of those food products. I have maintained not only in discussions here, but in other public utterances, that the price of food products to the consumer ranged all the way from an advance of 200 to 600 or 800 per cent over the value of the product upon the farm.

To establish a basis for the discussion of the question whether or not the protection ought to be taken away from the farmer's products I have introduced this resolution, with the hope that the Committee on Agriculture will give the world the true facts in relation to the cost of the product as it is sold upon the farm and the cost of the product when it is sold by the retailer and to determine the comparative cost of the production upon the farm and the added cost after the product has passed through the hands of the wholesaler and into the hands of the retailer. When the committee have done that I am very well satisfied, Mr. President, that we will come to the conclusion that the protection which the farmer himself is receiving upon his products is not more than what is adequate and just, and that the prices which are charged are due to the exorbitant rates and prices that are placed upon those products after they leave the hands of the farmer, and in which he has not his proportionate share of interest.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have supported the tariff legislation at all times upon the theory and in the belief that it would add to the prosperity of the people of this country regardless of class. More than 90 per cent of the people of this country are producers. Less than 10 per cent are exclusively consumers. I do not believe that Congress should engage in sifting the producers into classes and discriminating against one class at the expense or for the benefit of another.

Mr. President, this sham battle that is being engaged in by individuals and newspapers relative to the exorbitant price of the products of the people of this country is in my judgment thoughtless and senseless. I care not how prosperous any part of the people become, I want them all to be prosperous.

We were told not only when the last tariff bill was under discussion, but we have been told at all times when the question was being considered, that it was the farmers of the country who needed protection against combinations of trade. Mr. President, there is no bar to any person engaging in business. I remember that I, in common with others, urged upon Congress, as I have urged upon the country, that the prosperity would induce more men to engage in business. The spirit of the resolution and the spirit of the newspaper and individual discussion would seem to be that the Government and its prosperity was to rest only upon the prosperity of the men now engaged in business. If business is too profitable, if the profits are too great, it affords a splendid opportunity for the people of this country to engage in the business that is so profitable.

Perhaps an enlargement of the field of competition in production might accomplish all that these dreamers think they will accomplish by having the Government undertake to regulate the price of commodities to the consumer. We would pretty soon be issuing a government bulletin every morning fixing the price of labor, the price of wheat, the price of meat, and the price of every commodity. I have no sympathy with it; and I have only taken this occasion, which seems appropriate, to thus express my views.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I would call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to his resolution. Does he think that it might not be expedient to include in the resolution a report as to the amount of exports to other countries of cattle and meat-food products from cattle, and so forth, to which he refers, and a comparison of the extent of that and similar exportations from other cattle-producing countries, and also the prices which are charged in other countries for cattle and the meat products therefrom which we export to those countries? Would that seem to be wise?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would suppose that we could get from the Bureau of Statistics at any time what the exports were, without any investigation, particularly by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is probably true.

Mr. McCUMBER. The other proposition, I think, however, might properly go in, if any Senator desires.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suggest that.

Mr. McCUMBER. My only object was to secure such an investigation as would show distinctly that the higher prices that have obtained for the retail of meat and other farm products are entirely out of proportion to the higher price that is being received upon the farm.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I heard very clearly the Senator's exceedingly lucid statement as to the purpose of his resolution. I suppose everybody wants the facts about this question. But I was suggesting to the Senator whether he thought it would not be possible to have, in addition to that, the prices at which similar products are sold abroad and the amount that this country, in which these high prices prevail, exports to foreign countries.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would be very valuable, and I am willing either to accept an amendment, if the Senator desires, or to allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Agriculture, and they can amend it in any form they see fit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have not had the time. I have just read the resolution, and I called the Senator's attention to it in case he might amend it himself or handle that suggestion in any way he sees fit.

Mr. McCUMBER. It can be taken up in committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well. I think the Senator knows, for he is very carefully informed about this matter, and he can state to me whether I am correct or not in my impression that the United States is the largest exporter of cattle and of meat-food products prepared from cattle of any country in the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true, I think.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That being true, it would seem that the tariff on cattle and meat is not tremendously necessary.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a message on the table from the House of Representatives returning House bill 14464, which I ask be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14464) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by M. C. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On January 26, 1910:

S. 3929. An act to authorize the Tennessee, Alabama and Kentucky Railway to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near the town of Gainesboro, Tenn.;

S. 4016. An act to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Yankton, S. Dak., by the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company; and

S. 5197. An act to change the times for holding the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States at Greensboro and at Charlotte, in the western district of North Carolina.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13915. An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a bureau of mines was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17500) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the request of the House for a conference be granted, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF PRACTICE IN FEDERAL COURTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 3724) regulating injunctions and the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States was announced as the first bill in order.

Mr. KEAN. That bill has been on the calendar for some time. I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] does not want it put on the calendar under Rule IX. I think it had better go over. There are amendments to be offered to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

LANDS IN ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 183) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the bill may go over, and also the next one on the calendar.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, this is the fourth time this bill has been reached in the regular call of the calendar. When it was first reached there were certain amendments to the bill, the report was not here, and it was necessarily passed over. Yesterday and the day before I was unavoidably absent from the Senate and could not be here.

This and the succeeding bill are matters of importance to the people of our State and to the people of the United States. It people of our State and to the people of the United States. It has been favorably recommended by the department. The bill, after it was introduced, was submitted to the Indian tribe, and it is satisfactory to them. It is of the highest importance, we feel, not only to the Indian tribe but to the people of the State, and especially of that section of the State, that the bill shall be considered.

Mr. PENROSE. I made the request at the suggestion of several Senators who are unable to be in the Chamber. I shall not persist in my opposition if the Senator will let the bill go over to-day, and when it comes up to-morrow I will not oppose it. Let the next bill on the calendar also go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

LANDS IN THE PINE RIDGE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask also that the bill (S. 2341) authorizing the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, go over.

Mr. GAMBLE. I understand, then, that the two bills will go over without prejudice, retaining their places on the calendar.

Mr. PENROSE. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1630) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington property was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the objection of the Senator from Idaho, the bill goes over.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 404) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill goes over.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I object to the bill going over, and I move to take up the bill for consideration now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the bill be now considered, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Idaho. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask for a division.

I want to say, Mr. President, that this is a bill providing for the observance of one day in the week as a day of rest in the District of Columbia. Every State in the Union has a law on this subject, and this is quite a liberal measure. It just forbids the opening of the stores, the conducting of business, and work on public and private buildings, and provides for the closing of barrooms, pool rooms, and theaters. I think it is a matter which addresses itself to the consideration of a vast majority of the people in this District.

The opponents of the bill have had a hearing. It is exactly the same bill that was unanimously reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia at the last Congress and passed by the Senate.

There is but one class of objection, so far as I find, in the whole country. I have on my desk here about 90 telegrams, sent to the chairman of the committee. All of them ask for a hearing on the bill, evidently not knowing that that hearing had been had.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I think the bill is not open to debate on a motion to proceed to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order. The point of order is well taken. The Senator from Alabama asks for a division.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLINT. I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PILES. My colleague [Mr. JONES] was called from the Chamber a few moments ago. I expected him back by this time, but he has not yet returned.

The result was announced—yeas 59, nay 1, as follows:

NAYS—59.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 404) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation in the District of Columbia on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to labor at any trade or calling, or to employ or cause to be employed his apprentice or servant in any labor or business, except in household work or other work of necessity or charity, and except also newspaper publishers, and their employees, and except also public-service corporations and their employees, in the necessary supplying of service to the people of the District: Provided, That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person in said District on said day to engage in any circus, show, or theatrical performance; Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed so as to prohibit sacred concerts, nor the regular business of hotels and restaurants on said day; nor to the delivery of articles of food, including meats, at any time before 10 o'clock in the morning of said day from June 1 to October 1; nor to the sale of milk, fruit, confectionery, ice, soda and mineral waters, newspapers, periodicals, cigars, drugs, medicines, and surgical appliances; nor to the business of livery stables, or other public, or the use of private, conveyances; nor to the handling and operation of the United States mail.

SEC. 3. That any person or corporation who shall violate the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10 or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia for not more than ten days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That all prosecutions for violations of this act shall be in the police courts of the District of Columbia and in the name of the District.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in section 1, page 1, line 9, after the word "employees," I move to insert the words "bootblacks and porters."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am rather inclined to think that it is more important for a man to be shaved than it is to have his shoes polished. The one is a question of neatness only, the other is a question of comfort and neatness. If we are going to make that exception, we ought to except barbers also.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think so, too.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the Senator from Alabama, while I am on my feet, if it is possible that there is at this time no Sunday law in the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will say that corporation counsel for the city of Washington say that there is none, except prohibiting barrooms, pool rooms, and bootblacks from operating.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Texas that I think the only law which could be called a Sunday law in this District is contained in the provisions of the excise law, which prohibit certain things being done in the matter of liquors.

Mr. BAILEY. That prohibition would probably be such as the States would make regarding election day, and that could hardly be called a Sunday law.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Texas that there is no Sunday law, properly so called, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that there ought to be such a law; but this bill, in one or two respects, seems a little sweeping. My inclination would be to prohibit men from pursuing on Sunday their usual trade or occupation. I think probably that is the language employed in the statutes of most of the States, the purpose being to separate Sunday from the other days of the week; but this language is "any trade or calling." Perhaps there is no very great distinction between that and the usual trade or calling. I do not believe that we ought to assume to be more strict about these things than even the Great Book itself, which permits us to get our ox out of the ditch. I imagine that there is no disposition here to be more strict than that, or to be unreasonable.

I have always understood that there was some sort of regulation here which prevented a man from obtaining a shave on Sunday, as the matter now stands. That seems, however, I am told by some Senators around me, to be a regulation among the barbers themselves, and not the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas will permit me, while I can not turn to the statute now, I think that Sunday shaving by barbers is prohibited by law. However that may be, it is a fact that the barbers as a body have protested against granting them that privilege, and they want their shops closed on Sunday. That I remember very well, having received at some time during my service here petitions from the barbers—possibly a union—calling my attention to the desirability of having their shops closed on that day and stating that they did not wish any legislation which would enable them to be open.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PAYNTER. I wish to make a statement similar to the one which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has just made. The employees of barber shops desired that the shops should be closed on Sunday because they did not want to work on that day; they wanted it as a day of rest. If the law required that the shops should be closed on Sunday, then the proprietors could not ask them to work on that day. The employees in barber shops, as well as the other laboring people of the District, asked Congress to enact a law that would give them protection. So one purpose of the act is to protect the laboring people of the District in the enjoyment of a day of rest.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am not disposed to allow any class of people to come to the legislative assemblies of the country to settle controversies between them and their employees. I certainly would not insist that a barber ought to work if he does not want to work; but if there is any occupation, trade, or employment that can be fairly excepted from the operation of a statute like this, it is that of the barber. If a gentleman who travels a thousand miles, and is accustomed to shave probably every day, reaches the city of Washington fatigued from long travel, with a three days' growth of beard, he would infinitely rather have the hair shaved off his face than the mud brushed off his boots; and he is better entitled to it, in my opinion.

So far as I am concerned, I am not disposed to allow any class to come and ask for a law that interferes with some man who wants to pursue his calling, simply because some other man does not want to pursue it; and if any exceptions are to be made, it seems to me that exception ought to be made. I venture to say that, in spite of what the law now is, if a man searches right diligently, he can find some place in the great city of Washington to get a shave on Sunday.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would not be misunderstood as to my position in this matter; and it can be very briefly stated. I had hoped to get some expression from those responsible for the measure as to the motive behind it. If I vote for it, my vote will be based upon principle.

I believe in the observance of the Sabbath day, but I object to the proviso in this bill. I object to legislative discrimination between the moral code of different men. If this is a day of rest, a Christian of the standard type or a Seventh-day Adventist can agree upon the day that shall be observed as a day of rest, but when you inject into a bill, in the proviso, the religious principle, then I say it is not a proper subject for legislation at all.

I should like some Senator who has taken interest in this proposed legislation to state, so that the record may show forever, whether or not this is a religious measure or an economic measure. Then I shall be ready to vote in a minute. I will not vote upon a religious measure which attempts to discriminate between classes of people based upon their religious belief, because I believe that is not only inconsistent, but forbidden. But if it is an economic question, that the people shall upon one day, in order that no man may profit as against another, lay aside business, well and good. I am ready to vote for it. That is the reason I have cast my vote against the consideration of the bill, and that is the reason I spoke against it.

I do not want the pill sugar coated. If we are going to vote upon religious discrimination, I want it stated fairly and candidly that that is the basis of our judgment and our vote. If it is merely that the world may stand at rest for a day, regardless of religious principle, well and good. Let us do it.

I try to observe the Sabbath in a proper manner; I would not see the wheels of industry move every day in the year. I believe in a day of rest, but on principle. I am not a Seventh-day Adventist on principle. I do not believe in recognizing this class of legislation as being a legitimate consideration for Congress. There is a great institution within the borders of this District whose members believe that what we call Saturday is really Sunday. There are enough of them to keep open on Pennsylvania avenue or Seventh street a whole line of stores on every Sunday with the custom of their own people or of such other people as may be pleased to deal with them. If this bill should be enacted, we would have in our midst two classes of people, one class resting on one day and closing their places of business, and another class, not insignificant in number, with their stores open and their business counters spread before the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have that now.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests that we have that now. Is there a complaint that these people open their stores and do business on our Sunday? If so, this bill does not cure it. It makes an exception in their favor. If men are to act upon their conscience in the performance of the deeds of good citizenship, let it rest in their conscience. If we want a universal day of rest, let us eliminate all attempt to recognize the difference between religious creeds and say that the seventh day of the week shall be a day of rest, and let everybody conform to it. That is my objection and that is my position.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have very much enjoyed the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I certainly am in favor of keeping one day of the week as a day of rest and recreation and for the purpose of religious worship, if the individual so desires. But what is the real purpose behind this bill? Is it to apply a religious test in the District of Columbia? If that is the purpose of the bill, then the trimmings permitting the sale of fruit, newspapers, confectionery, cigars, and other things ought to be cut out of it. If there is going to be a religious test applied in the capital of the United States, then the bill should so specify, and cut out many of the exemptions that are in it. If it is not a religious test, then there is no occasion for the passage of this kind of a law in the capital of this great Republic.

I think in a republican form of government one of the most dangerous programmes that legislatures can enter upon is anything looking toward the establishment of a religious test through a court of law.

I think there is an exemption in this bill in favor, possibly, of Seventh-day Adventists and Jews, but in some way or other the bill provides that those persons whose conscience impels them to keep another day than Sunday in order to keep within the provisions of the bill must be members of a religious body. Suppose they are converts to one of these different kinds of religion and believe Saturday is the legitimate Sunday, as usually interpreted, are they to be convicted under this bill because they have not affiliated and joined some other religious society?

I notice by the provision in line 5 of the bill that everyone is prohibited from working at any trade or calling. Under the provisions of this bill you could not send for a doctor if a man were sick at your house on Sunday without making both the patient and doctor liable to prosecution and fine or imprisonment.

I notice that page 2 of the bill permits a pretty easy-going time on Sunday. We can buy fruit and soda water and mineral water and newspapers and confectionery, we can buy cigars; but the poor man who smokes his pipe can not buy tobacco. I think whenever you begin to specify what can be done on Sunday and what can not be done you are going to find yourselves confronted with a most difficult proposition.

Under the bill as it now stands, the man who smokes two-bit cigars can go to a store on Sunday and buy them, while the man who smokes his pipe or wants to buy a plug of tobacco can not do it. One act is a crime, and the other is legitimate. I think before the Senate of the United States undertakes to enact legislation of this kind it ought to be most deliberately considered and most carefully phrased.

Here we provide that the street cars may run on Sunday. So the public-service corporations can continue to require the thousand or more men in this town engaged in running street railways, some of whom work ten, twelve, and fourteen hours a day, to labor on Sunday, while if their neighbor who works at some other trade or employment works on Sunday he commits a crime and is liable to be sent to jail.

The livery stables can keep open on Sunday under the bill, but the man with an automobile to hire commits a crime if he hires his machine on Sunday.

I do think, Mr. President, before this bill is put on its final passage that it should be better considered than apparently it has been up to this time. I know that the great cry in this country among certain classes of citizens is for Sunday observance. If this bill is to provide a day of recreation and rest, then it is legitimate; but if it is to apply a religious test in this great Republic, it is a very dangerous proceeding, and, notwithstanding the popularity that will attend the support of this bill as it now stands, I think the Senate of the United States ought to pause and well consider the proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, so far from there being any effort to apply a religious test in this bill, the effort plainly has been to avoid doing so.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will let me finish, I think perhaps I am going to anticipate exactly what he intends to say.

The only possible ground for criticism to that effect is against the expression that to be exempt from the provisions of the bill those who observe Saturday as a day of rest must be members of a religious society. I imagine that there would be absolutely no objection on the part of anybody to amending that so as to read, as suggested by my friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who sits by me, so as to make it apply to "those who observe that day," the purpose being to permit a man to exercise his conscience in that regard as instructed by any religious creed. I think that a very sensible and proper permission for the law to grant.

Now, Mr. President, there is a rule of law—and there never was a better rule to remember in making laws as well as in construing laws—and that is de minimis non curat lex, concerning small things the law takes no notice, and it ought to take none. Therefore when we come to make a law, for Senators to wrangle over whether somebody shall be permitted to buy a cigar or a plug of tobacco or have his shoes polished or have his face shaved, I think, is a waste of time.

In my judgment, the one way to make the observance of the Sabbath unpopular would be to make it so rigid that every man of common sense would revolt against the arrangement. I think if the Senator wants to make the law unpopular, it would be well to write in it that nobody should do anything. In this city of such great distances, if you did not permit the street cars to run, some good folk could not reach their churches, because they are not all as able to get about as is the Senator from Montana. They can not all walk; some of them must ride, especially if the place at which they worship is any distance from their homes, and many of those people have no vehicles of their own and no conveyance except a public conveyance, and I think it wise that a provision is incorporated in the bill allowing the street cars to run on Sunday.

Neither do I believe that a Christian man must make the Sabbath a still day. I think that it is not necessary in a country like this, nor in any other country, that we should all go into our homes and close the doors and disturb nobody with a suggestion of any kind. I do not believe in that kind of a Sunday; I do not believe that the most enlightened Christian ministers of this country advocate that kind of a Sunday. All they ask—and they do not ask it as religionists, although many of them probably would never have thought about the matter except in that way—but as good citizens all they ask is a sensible police regulation. That replies to the inquiry proposed by the Senator from Idaho. As for myself, I advocate this bill as a proper police regulation, such as, I think, has been adopted long since in every State in the Union. I imagine the State of Idaho has a Sunday-observance law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. The State of Idaho has a Sunday-observance law. I thoroughly approve of a law for the observance of a day of rest, and I select the Sabbath as that day.

Mr. BAILEY. Because most people observe it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I attend and participate in religious exercises on that day, but if we select that day for one, let us select it for all. This bill excepts the Jews.

Mr. BAILEY. And so it ought.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the Seventh-day Adventists.

Mr. BAILEY. That is also right.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are excepted on what ground? On the ground of religious conscience?

Mr. BAILEY. Upon the ground that their conscience instructs them to observe another day, and if they observe that day as a day of rest, they need not observe this day. If the law made no such exception as that, it would simply mean that the Jew, who observes Saturday and closes his place of business, must then follow it with the observance of Sunday and close his place of business for a second day of the week instead of for a single day, as men of our faith do.

So far as I am concerned, I have not enough religious zeal to be narrow about it. I think some of the narrowest men I have ever seen in my life probably have less religion than I have. I have a tolerance for every faith. I believe that any religion in this world is better than none at all, and, so far as I am concerned, I will never attempt to discriminate against the Jew, because he never attempts to discriminate against anybody else. Not only so, but no class of people in America are more law-abiding and more thoroughly respect the rights of every man than the Jewish race. That must be said to their honor here or in any other forum. They obey the law more exactly than any of our other fellow-citizens; there are fewer of them in the penitentiaries, and fewer of them in the poorhouses than any other race of people. A race that so behaves itself, I think, is entitled to be allowed to follow its conscience as to which of the seven days it observes as a day of rest, the lawmaking body having determined that all men must observe some day as a day of rest in every week.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not like to be put in a position where it might be even inferred that I had expressed myself in favor of discrimination against either the Seventh-day Adventists or the Jews. If you put it on a religious basis, that would be true, and, putting it on a religious basis, I would not vote for the measure; but putting it on the basis of a day of rest and a police measure, as the Senator has suggested, then there is no discrimination against anybody.

Mr. BAILEY. And the very fact that the bill allows men compelled by religious conviction to observe one day rather than another is a plain effort to avoid religious discrimination. It simply allows a man to rest that day which his conscience selects. But the law still says he must rest one day in seven.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is a very sensible police regulation.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. As the bill now stands, the only way the Jew, the Seventh-day Adventist, and other people who believe in observing another day in the week than Sunday for rest and religious enjoyment can take advantage of it is to prove their membership in some such religious body.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator's suggestion is a very sensible one. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] had already expressed to me an opinion that the bill could be worded in that respect more in consonance with the views which I assume all Senators entertain. I think a man whose conscience requires him to observe one day rather than another ought to be protected, though he may not be a member of any religious organization or society; and I imagine from what the Senator from Kentucky has already said to me that he intends to propose an amendment of that kind. If he does, I shall very cheerfully vote for it; and except that he was the first one who suggested it to me I should feel inclined to anticipate him and do it myself.

Mr. PAYNTER and Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PAYNTER. If the Senator from Montana desires to proceed, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. DIXON. I will wait.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in connection with this feature of the bill. I was very earnest in my effort to have something substantially similar to this inserted in the bill. I quite agree with the Senator from Montana and with the Senator from Idaho that, if there was a religious feature of the bill, it should be eliminated, but I do not believe there is one.

We have had in Kentucky, for perhaps a century, substantially such a provision as I sought to have incorporated in this bill—a provision to the effect that persons who observed some day other than Sunday as a day of rest should not incur the penalty of the law. They should enjoy liberty of conscience in the worship of God. They should have the unrestricted right to determine what day they should observe as the Sabbath or a day of rest. They should not be compelled, in order to obey their conscience, to devote two days out of the seven to rest.

I will suggest an amendment to the bill. The bill as reported reads this way:

That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday—

Then I suggest as an amendment language as follows—

or persons whose religious views coincide with such religious societies—

Then, continuing—

shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a Sabbath one day in seven as a day of rest.

I think that would express my purpose. Suppose, for instance, a person entertains the same views that a certain religious society does upon the question of the Sabbath day, although he may not have identified himself with that society, still he should not be subject to the penalties of this act any more than the members of such society should be.

Mr. CLAPP. Would it not be better, commencing in line 12, after the word "who," to strike out the balance of that line, so that it would read:

That persons who observe as a Sabbath any other day.

It would make it simpler, it seems to me, than the Senator's amendment.

Mr. PAYNTER. I thought of that, and it would be perfectly satisfactory to me to so amend the bill. Under this amendment anyone who desired to do so, if he observed another day as the Sabbath, could prove that he entertained these religious views and thus escape the penalty of the law.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will pardon me. My suggestion would eliminate any difference between those who are members and those who sympathize, and it would exempt all who observed. If after the word "who," in line 12, we struck out the balance of that line, it would read:

Provided, That persons who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday.

It would simplify it.

Mr. PAYNTER. That expresses the view I have embodied in the amendment I have suggested, and I trust the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. CLAPP. I will offer that as an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I was about to make the very observation the Senator from Minnesota has made. I think his proposition covers what we are seeking to accomplish. Of course it may be abused in some cases, but we can not help that.

Mr. BAILEY. It is better that some few should abuse the law than that the law should abuse the many.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator. I think the amendment is proper, and if the Senator had not suggested it I was about to ask the Senator from Alabama, who has charge of the bill, if it would not be agreeable to him to make it.

Mr. MONEY and Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. CLAPP. After this amendment shall have been disposed of, I have some other amendments to offer. However, if the Senator from Mississippi rises to this amendment, I will yield.

Mr. MONEY. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I yield.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, this is a Christian Nation, and not a Christian Government. That is forbidden by the Constitution. Jew or Gentile, Mohammedan or Brahman, has a right to his own religious convictions. There is nothing in this bill about religious observance. It is an effort to secure a day of rest; and there can not be a half a dozen days of rest by law. If we respect Saturday as the Sabbath of the Jews and the Seventh-day Adventists, we must respect Friday as the day of the Mussulman; and I do not know how many African tribes have Thursday or Wednesday or Monday as their only day. This is simply an effort to secure one day out of seven for rest, and if anybody considers Saturday as the Sabbath—and undoubtedly it is the Sabbath, and not Sunday—he of course can rest that day, if he chooses.

But it will not do, in my opinion, to complicate the difficulties of the execution of this proposed law by permitting a man who does observe Saturday on his motion to violate Sunday on his own motion because he observes another day. We are securing a day of rest for all, and if he wants two days he can take them. Certainly, I think, you will find difficulty in closing up one house of business and allowing another alongside to keep open because the first was closed the day before. It is the difficulty of executing the law.

I wish to say further, while we are not authorized to legislate about religious observances of any sort or to make holy days of any sort, yet Congress can legislate in respect to the general public opinion. It ought to defer to the general public opinion, and the general public opinion in the United States is that Sunday is a day of rest, and in obedience to that general opinion we propose this legislation. Whether it is better for a people to rest one day or not, to rest one day is a question which is easily answered. If a man wants to prosecute his profession for a certain time on that day, as has been provided for by the Senator from Alabama in his bill, he can do so.

If his conscience dictates that he must not work, he can close his shop. Nobody can compel a man to work on Sunday. Neither can the law compel him to work any other day in the week, but it can say that on a certain day or on a certain part of a day no work shall be done. Why? First because of the economic principle that every man ought to rest one day in the week, and probably two. Secondly, because there is a deference paid by the great body of the people to the sanctity of that day, if you please.

I do not think the amendment is a good one. I do not believe there ought to be permission to anybody to work on that day, except the classes specified—not classes of men, not classes of religionists, but professions and vocations of different sorts that seem to be necessary to the comfort and convenience of the people generally. I think the range taken by the Senator from Alabama is pretty comprehensive. It lets almost anybody have part of the time at least on that day.

As to the closing of places of amusement on Sunday, that may be another question. I do not know whether it is in the bill or not. I refer to the closing of places of amusement.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; it is.

Mr. MONEY. On that matter I shall vote in support of this bill, but I am very clear that amusements of an innocent sort constitute the best kind of rest; there can not be any better; and if it is in accord with the newspaper article I heard read the other day—that all concerts be prohibited except sacred concerts—I would close sacred concerts, too, if the performers sang for money.

Mr. BAILEY. This bill expressly closes all places of amusement except sacred concerts.

Mr. MONEY. That is what I see. If the sacred concerts are held for money, they ought to be closed just as well as the others. I say recreation is a part of rest and the best part of it.

I would have any singing anywhere on Sunday, in the church at the church hour, elsewhere at the proper hour, if people wanted it. I am not in favor of the blue laws of Connecticut or the old kirk of Scotland regulations, and the trouble about these reform movements is that they never stop at the point which was intended by the beginners. It is like the prohibition movement which swept over the county. "The way to hell is paved with good intentions." When you get reforms in the hands of reformers, they are generally emotional people with small development of the rational faculty, and prompted by their repeated successes, they go from one reform to another, and it is proposed that one shall attend church on Sunday; then a particular church; then a constable is permitted to invade one's home, if he does not attend church, to see whether or not he is sick; then one can not kiss his wife on Sunday. The beginnings of these things are very innocent.

I shall vote for this measure, but I do not want any sacred concert on Sunday, unless it is free, any more than any other concert. I might say that there should be no sermons unless they were free, but I will not say that, because Sunday is the preacher's day, the day on which he earns his salary. I have no objections to pew rents and all that sort of thing, but it does seem to me, if we are going to set aside a day of rest, it ought to be a day of rest for everybody, and we should not have the incongruity of having half the stores on F street and Pennsylvania avenue open on Sunday because our Jewish friends see fit to observe the preceding day.

There is no man in the world who has higher respect for the Jewish people than I have. There is no other people on the face of this planet who for thousands of years, without a home, have distinctly preserved their nationality and their features. They have never yet blended with any people; they have gone to every island and every continent; and yet through all the ages they have preserved with peculiar obstinacy every one of their physical features; and the Jew of to-day is the same as the Jew of four thousand years ago in the monumental land of Egypt.

No man can pay higher tribute to the Jew than I can for their development in philosophy, in music, in poetry. There never was a book written like Job, and there are passages in Isaiah of Jehovah equal to any flight in the Odyssey or the Iliad. So in every department of learning, in humanitarian work, in philanthropic work, they stand preeminent. But the great crowning monument of the Jew, if I may say it, is that he has preserved his identity through all the changes and revolutions of time. Distressed, persecuted, driven from post to pillar, consigned to obscure countries, and even expelled from countries which he had made to flourish, he has never failed to preserve the original Jewish characteristics.

I say that much to relieve me of any suspicion of wishing to shut him out from his day of worship. I want him to have his day of worship and his day of rest.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. CLAPP. I will yield for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have seen the Senate in session on Sunday, and, as I understood, there was no absolute necessity for it; there was no ox in the ditch. I want to know if we are going to try to punish ourselves or if we are immune. We are trying to handcuff everybody else on this question. I wish to get a little light, if somebody will give it to me.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is very easy to observe the complications which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] points out, and still it would be out of the question, it seems to me, to pass a bill of this kind without recognizing the right of those who do not observe what we call the first day of the week, the people of those various faiths who, as the Senator from Texas has well said, are among our most law-abiding people. Their rights should be recognized.

I sympathize with the Senator from Texas. I think it would have been infinitely better to have made a simple, straight prohibition here without attempting to classify the various callings that are excepted; and, on page 2, I move to strike out all after the word "first," in line 12, including lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, down to the word "nor," so that it will read:

Including meats, at any time before 10 o'clock in the morning of said day from June 1 to October 1, nor to the handling and operation of the United States mail.

I can see no reason for excepting confectionery, soda water, mineral waters, cigars, and such things. So far as those items may be necessary, they are fully covered by the very first provision of the bill, which excepts necessary and charitable labor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. An observation which was made by the Senator from Texas leads me to fear that there is some misunderstanding with regard to the operation of the proviso of the first section. I assume that one of the purposes sought to be accomplished by this bill is to prevent shows, theaters, circuses, and other amusements of that character on Sunday. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether, with all due regard to differences of religious opinions with respect to the observance of one day in the week, we ought to permit a Jew to run a theater on Sunday if an American can not run a theater on Sunday, or whether a Seventh-day Adventist should be permitted to run a baseball game on Sunday, if a Presbyterian, as I am, can not run a baseball game on Sunday?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not mean to deal lightly with the inquiry, but I do not think either a Jew or a Seventh-day Adventist could conduct such amusements on Sunday.

Mr. CUMMINS. They could under this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are absolutely prohibited from doing so under section 2 of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. They are prohibited, anyway.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, as he is proposing to amend the bill, and especially that of the chairman of the committee, to one point. You will observe that the proviso is:

Provided, That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath day any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act.

If they are not liable to the penalties prescribed in this act, there is and can be no prohibition against the things I have suggested, so far as they are concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. But let the Senator read——

Mr. CLAPP. Section 2.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator read the close of the first section? They—— shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. If a Jew or a Seventh-day Adventist or any other man who believes in the observance of and does observe some other day than the first day of the week as a religious ceremony, or as one of rest, he can open his theater on Sunday or his baseball game on Sunday, or anything else he may see fit to do, because there is no penalty prescribed against it in the act.

Mr. CLAPP. But there is. Section 2 then proceeds to say:

That it shall be unlawful for any person in said District on said day—

Mr. GALLINGER. "Any person."

Mr. CLAPP (reading):

to engage in any circus, show, or theatrical performance.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. CLAPP. No matter who it is.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the section says that no penalty shall be imposed upon any person as specifically exempted in the proposed act. What does it mean? The reason I rose to make the suggestion——

Mr. CLAPP. I think possibly——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will you allow me for just a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The exception in section 1 should be limited to the prohibition of section 1 instead of extending over the entire act.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator is probably right about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think he is.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course, I did not have the bill in charge, and was more directly interested in this attempt to discriminate as to certain callings. I think the Senator is correct, and section 1 ought to be amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to make one suggestion in the utmost friendliness to the measure, because I believe in police regulations of this character. If you will read the language of section 1, I think you will find it very different from the language of similar prohibitions in any State of the Union. It would prohibit the preacher from preaching on Sunday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. You will notice that the prohibition extends to labor in any calling. "Calling" is the peculiar term used to describe the vocation of the preacher and other professional men. The language used in most of the States, I think, is "secular calling," "secular trade," or "occupation," if you like.

I think, upon observation, it will be found that this bill ought to be carefully recast and reconsidered before we attempt to enact into law (and, I repeat, it is in friendliness and sympathy) these high and exalted sentiments.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I have heretofore called attention to the fact that the bill would absolutely shut up churches in the District of Columbia because the ministers could not preach as the bill stands. As I said in my first remarks, legislation of this kind is fraught with so many dangers in such a Government as ours that it ought to be most thoroughly considered; and in view of all these various defects in the bill, I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the motion is put, I think it right that some member of the committee having charge of the bill should be permitted to say a word. I think the Senator from Alabama, at least, should be granted that courtesy.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will occupy but a few minutes. The committee that ordered the reporting of this bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana withhold his motion for the present in order that the Senator from New Hampshire may be heard?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a debatable motion under our rules, and he need not withhold it.

The committee that reported this bill has no pride of opinion about it. I apprehend that the Senator from Alabama expected that the bill would be amended on the floor, as usually happens in matters of legislation. But some of the objections that have been raised to the bill have no foundation in fact. The truth is, so far as my knowledge extends—and the corporation counsel in reporting on this bill gives it as his opinion—this is the only community in the United States that has not a Sunday rest law; every State has such a law, not in the terms of this bill, very likely, but in similar terms.

I recall coming to Washington one Sunday morning and taking the car to my hotel I noticed two great buildings in this city under process of erection. Teams and workmen were hauling material and putting up great steel structures to the annoyance of every person who did not feel that that was a proper condition of things in the capital of the Nation on the Sabbath day. Work on the great bank building opposite the Shoreham Hotel was conducted every Sunday during the time that it was being built, and other buildings of a similar nature have been constructed in the same way.

I feel, Mr. President, that while this bill is not perfect as it is now, and we will be glad to accept proper amendments—I am sure the Senator from Alabama will be glad to accept any proper amendment to the bill—it is time we legislated on this question, and we ought not to let technicalities stand in the way.

The Senator from Montana objects to several features of the bill. The Senator from Iowa suggests that the word "secular" ought to be inserted before the word "trade." While I do not think that important, there is no objection to it. My impression is that the term "work of necessity or charity" would take care of the ministers. It strikes me that there is a good deal of "necessity" for preaching in Washington. That is my impression.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator puts it on that ground, I yield my objection at once.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Although I do not believe the citizens generally would be willing to admit that there is any greater necessity for it here than elsewhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but we are legislating for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CUMMINS. The morality of the District of Columbia——

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sure the Senator from Alabama has no objection to accepting the proposed amendment.

The Senator from Montana objected to the bill on the ground that it allowed public-utility corporations to operate, but did not allow a man to take out his own carriage or automobile and take a ride on the streets or in the park on Sunday. It seems to me that the words, in line 16, page 2, "or other public, or the use of private, conveyances" will take care of all that class of people. We thought it would. If there is any better phraseology suggested, I am sure the Senator from Alabama will accept it. I certainly, as chairman of the committee, will gladly accept it.

So other objections have been made, it occurs to me, that have no valid argument in their behalf. Personally, I would be glad to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa, and I am quite ready to agree to striking out the words on line 12 to which the Senator from Minnesota objects. I myself have two or three inconsequential amendments that I want to offer to the bill. For instance, I can see no objection if the exemptions are made in the sale of certain articles that we should include the word "tobacco" as well as "cigars."

Mr. FRYE. We should not include either.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Maine says we ought not to include either. Very likely that is so, but if we are to have any exceptions, I feel sure that we can arrange the matter so that there will be no special trouble about it.

So far as the objection of the Senator from Iowa is concerned, that we ought to amend section 1, not being a lawyer perhaps I ought not to undertake——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon a suggestion?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think myself there is a good deal of force in the point made by the Senator from Iowa. If, after the word "be," in line 2 on page 2, the balance of that line to the word "act," in line 3, were stricken out and in lieu thereof the words "held to have violated the provisions of this section" inserted, it would free it of the embarrassment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very likely.

Mr. CLAPP. It would then read:

> Shall not be held to have violated the provisions of this section if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very likely that is a proper amendment. What I was going to say is that I think the inhibition in section 1 covers one class of matters and the provisions of section 2 cover another. I think that in section 2 we absolutely prohibit all persons from doing certain things, while in section 1 we say that a certain class of people shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe one day in each seven as a day of rest. So I do not really think there is any conflict in the two provisions. But I feel sure that the Senator from Alabama will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, so as to make that simply apply to section 1. There can be no objection to it.

Now, Mr. President, I think if these amendments are made, as suggested, and some others that doubtless will be offered, we can proceed with the consideration of this bill, and not recommit it to the committee. The Committee on the District of Columbia is a hard-worked committee. The Committee on the District of Columbia has given a good deal of consideration to this bill. Very likely the members of some other committee that individual Senators are connected with would have done better work than we have, but I think that our work has been fairly well done, and that after making these amendments we ought to proceed and pass the bill and send it to the other House. The motion to recommit ought not to be agreed to.

There is an urgent necessity for this legislation. We are doing no person any harm. We are not compelling men to rest on the Sabbath day if they conscientiously believe that they ought to rest on some other day; but that all men as well as all animals, so far as it is possible in the conduct of private and public affairs, should have one day of rest out of the seven goes without the saying. Surely the District of Columbia ought not to be behind all the States and Territories of the American Union in a matter of this kind, as it is at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he would not be willing to strike out the word "cigars" in line 14?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would, because I do not use them.

Mr. BORAH. Neither do I, as far as that is concerned. As it is a day of rest to a large portion of the human race, and the smoking of cigars is very pleasant for many people on Sunday, if we are going to trim the bill down to what it ought to be, I suggest that amendment. I move the amendment to strike out the word "cigars" in line 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Idaho that the pending amendment is one offered by his colleague, and the amendment now offered by him is not an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; I will offer it later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Therefore the amendment must be withheld until the pending amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am utterly opposed to the motion to recommit, which has been withdrawn temporarily. This measure has been pending now for over two years. Everyone recognizes the necessity for legislation of this kind. I think 95 per cent of the inhabitants of the District favor this legislation, and it is particularly favored by the workingmen. They appeared before the subcommittee and made an appeal to us. They said they were required to work on Sunday, and they could not cease from work, because if they stopped on Sunday they would be discharged from their employment and would lose their jobs.

I object to the amendment that was offered as to bootblacks and porters for the same reason that was given by those laboring men when they applied to us for relief. They represented 28,000 men in this city. They appeared before the committee and begged that this legislation should be had.

So far as I know, there is no one in the District who is opposing this legislation except a small body of Seventh-day Adventists. I think if they understood this bill they would have no just cause of complaint. We gave them an extended hearing, and they have had their day in court. I think the great body of the Christian people of this District should be considered in this matter. The motion to recommit merely means to postpone the measure, which is better understood now by the Senate probably than it has ever been.

I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky because——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that a motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thought it was withdrawn.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was withdrawn

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Montana to withdraw the motion?

Mr. DIXON. I said I would withhold it temporarily until the chairman in charge of the bill could be heard.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In line 5, the word "secular," before "calling," at the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I will accept, although I do not think it is necessary. I am willing to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, and also the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kentucky to strike out the words "who are members of a religious society." Then I am willing to accept the amendment in line 3, page 2, to insert the word "section" instead of "act," so as to make it perfectly clear. I do not think that amendment is necessary, but I am willing to accept it. If the Senator from Montana does not object, I will first move to amend by adding the word "secular" before "calling" in line 5, on page 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state that no amendment is now in order, unless it is an amendment to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Idaho, that being the pending amendment. If there is an amendment to that amendment, it can be received. Otherwise the Senate must dispose of the pending amendment, which is that offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What is the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "employees," insert the words "bootblacks and porters."

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope the Senator from Idaho will withdraw that amendment and let us perfect the bill now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not know why I should withdraw an amendment upon which I desire to have an expression of the Senate. I had intended to include the word "barbers," but the Senator from Texas called attention to that omission, and I thought it best to leave that to his judgment. However, it is very clear that those persons who render the class of personal service which makes one fit to go to church should be permitted to perform it. The man who drives the carriage in which you ride to church is prohibited from doing it under this bill. He is not in any class that is enumerated at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will look at page 2, line 16, I think he will find——

Mr. JOHNSTON. A private conveyance can not be used without a driver.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not a public service. The private carriage in which you go to church is not a public service such as is excepted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator will note that it says "the use of private conveyances." That includes the driver as well as the horse.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says, "nor to the business of livery stables, or other public, or the use of private conveyances;" but that does not explicitly exempt the coachman who is hired by the month or the year. But the amendment is now confined to porters and bootblacks. Those people of all others should be definitely provided for, because their method of earning a living is limited and their opportunities are scant. If you permit great public corporations, why should you not permit those people?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I accept both amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the pending amendment can only be acted upon by the Senate either by general consent or by vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. Until that amendment is disposed of there is nothing to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "employees," insert "bootblacks and porters."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to amend by inserting the word "secular," before "calling," in line 5, page 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In line 12 I move to strike out the words "who are members of a religious society."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to amend by striking out the word "act," in line 3, and inserting "section" in lieu of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That will not cover it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That will not fit.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That will not accomplish it.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest to the Senator in charge——

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana withdraw his motion further?

Mr. DIXON. I withdrew it in order that the chairman of the committee might make a statement.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 2, line 2, after the word "be," I move to strike out the balance of that line to the word "act," at the beginning of line 3, and to insert in lieu "held to have violated the provisions of this section," so that it will read, "shall not be held to have violated the provisions of this section."

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I think some of us ought to have an opportunity to at least consider some of the various amendments which are being offered. There are probably a dozen in the bill now. Here is a bill which comes into the Senate. Of course the Committee on the District of Columbia is probably the hardest worked committee here, but that does not relieve individual Senators from their own personal liability, and we ought not to pass hasty and ill-considered legislation. There have been a dozen amendments now accepted, as I understand the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. GALLINGER. Only two.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Minnesota now offers an amendment, and it is accepted, changing the whole bill as it now stands. As the amendment which has been accepted provides, persons do not even have to belong to a religious society, but a person who observes as Sunday any other day of the week than Sunday shall not be liable. It vitiates the whole bill, as the matter stands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

GOVERNMENT OF ALASKA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 5436.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily until we dispose of the bill which has been before the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am anxious to accommodate any Senator. How long will it take the Senator to complete the bill? The Senator is now perfecting his bill by committee amendments?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How soon does the Senator expect to pass the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. In a very short time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How long does the Senator think it would take to complete the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not think it would take over thirty minutes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. This bill has been the unfinished business now for four days. I am very anxious that we should proceed to the perfecting of the bill, at least to the extent of the reading of the committee amendments and the adoption of the committee amendments by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. While I am very loath, indeed, to inconvenience the Senator, if he would feel that he might complete his bill to-morrow in the morning hour, it would be pleasing to the committee if we might proceed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I want to say to the Senator that now we have had the bill under consideration and are familiar with it, we have our minds on it, and can dispose of it quicker now than at any other time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have stated twice before, and I repeat, that the committee is anxious to accommodate any Senator who has a measure here, provided it will not unreasonably delay the consideration of the pending bill. If the Senator makes it as a unanimous-consent agreement, I am willing that the Senate shall proceed for thirty minutes with the consideration of the bill which the Senator from Alabama has in charge, and that the unfinished business shall then be taken up for the reading of the bill and amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. I believe all of us want to pass a Sunday-observance law here, but we do not want to go off half cocked and in our hurry do something we will be ashamed of. I can see no reason why there can not be consent to put the bill off until to-morrow morning and let the Senator from Alabama in the meantime confer with those who want to have amendments made, and have the bill reprinted with the amendments, so that we can see it and know what we are doing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That course will be agreeable to me. I was only suggesting that I am willing that the unfinished business shall be laid aside temporarily to oblige the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Indiana desires to take up for consideration specially the Alaska bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The unfinished business has already been taken up, by virtue of its right, and it is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What the chairman of the committee is willing to do, at the request of the Senator from Alabama, is to agree to his request for unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for thirty minutes, that he may complete his bill. After that suggestion was made, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] suggested that it would be in the interest of careful legislation if the Senator from Alabama would let his measure go over until to-morrow morning in the regular way, to be considered in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not losing its place.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not losing its place.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will appeal to my colleague on the committee to let the bill go over until to-morrow. I will, in doing that, however, call attention to the fact that the bill we are about to consider, and which has the right of way, introduced by the Senator from Indiana, who, as the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is in the habit of saying, is an old and experienced legislator, has been amended by himself, I think, about 100 times more or less.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It has been amended by the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman.

Mr. GALLINGER. So the fact that the Sunday-observance bill needs amendment is not in a class by itself; it is like every other bill that comes before this body. I appeal to my colleague on the committee in charge of the bill to let it go over, and we will take care of it to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will consent to that; and I want to give notice that I shall press the consideration of the bill and not permit a matter of this gravity and weight to be deferred by hypercritical criticism.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I want to get at the substance of the measure. The bill is, as the title indicates, "for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia." It involves no religious question whatever. It compels no man to observe any day as a religious festival. I intend to press it until it comes to a final vote, and then Senators can vote against it if they wish to do so, and they will vote for it if they favor the measure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I ask that the pending bill with the committee amendments may be read as reported.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, if he intends at this time to proceed with the committee amendments with a view to their adoption by the Senate?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I expect to proceed in what I understand to be the regular way. That regular way was thrashed out at a great extent and many times at the last session. I think it is pretty well understood. I will state it now so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand the regular way perfectly, as to committee amendments.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought it, perhaps, might be of use to the Senate to restate it, but I presume it is well understood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. When this bill came up, upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana, two or three days ago, it was suggested that the Senate perhaps was not in possession of such definite information as might be advisable in the consideration of a bill of this sort. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana again to the proposition, that I believe before the Senate enters upon the consideration of the bill it ought to be fully advised by means of some report from the Committee on Territories, which has had charge of the bill, as to the necessities of the bill, as to the requirements of the public service, and as to the general information in regard to the district of Alaska that it is necessary for the Senate to have.

Undoubtedly the Committee on Territories have all this information, otherwise they would not have brought the bill into the Senate. Unfortunately the rest of us have it not. There is nothing whatever to guide us in the determination of the bill, which creates a Territory without a territorial form of government, which makes a legislative assembly dependent, not upon the voice of the people of the district for which they legislate, but makes it an appointment of the Executive. In general, there are so many large questions which enter into the bill, and the subject is so great, that it seems to me the Senate ought to have, in passing to the consideration of the bill, some report or some information in some way laid before the Senate so that we may act intelligently upon the matters brought to our attention.

I do not think we ought to be asked to enter upon the consideration of a bill of this sort without some preliminary report. I say this with a full realization of the work which the committee itself and the chairman have put upon the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator has read the remarks made by the chairman, after moving the bill as the unfinished business, he will observe it was then stated that that statement on behalf of the committee was made in lieu of a report. I quite agree with the Senator that all matters of important legislation should have either such a statement or a report, and either is usual.

In this connection I might call the Senator's attention to the fact that in this bill already there has been a more extensive statement, in lieu of a report, than was made at the last session on the most important measure that can possibly come before the United States Congress, a measure which the Senator in all of its phases, I believe, supported with great heartiness and vigor. The tariff bill was reported without any report except a recommendation that it pass, and I did not hear from the Senator any request for a detailed report from the Committee on Finance with reference to the tariff bill. Neither was as complete a statement made in proceeding to the consideration of that bill as the chairman of this committee has made for his committee concerning the pending bill.

Now, the Senator will find, I think, on looking over the statement made in lieu of a report, and which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER] remarked was amply sufficient, the broad, general outlines as to the facts upon which the bill was based, the purposes it was designed to accomplish, and in outline its general features. That statement, taken in connection with the bill itself, will, I think, inform the Senator sufficiently for him to find any other information which he may desire.

I will say, if the Senator does not wish the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill to-day, or any other day, he will find, in my response to his similar inquiry when I was making my statement, that the committee is willing to lay it aside temporarily at any time at the convenience of a Senator, provided it does not unreasonably delay or imperil the bill, and of course of that fact the committee, which is responsible for it, must be the judge. Do I understand that the Senator does not want us to go on with the bill to-day?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I will not be put, either by the chairman of the committee or any other member of this body, in the position of opposing going on with the bill at any time. What I want to express is my belief that the Senate in considering a bill of this importance has a right to have some statement, some report of the committee, not a report of the views of an individual member of the committee, no matter how well posted he may be as to the facts; but we have a right as Senators in this body to a report of the committee setting forth the facts and the conditions that require this legislation or make it advisable.

There is no man in this body who is more anxious than myself to see that the proper legislation is had, and speedily had, in relation to the Territory of Alaska. As I said, I have no desire to impede the progress of the bill, but if we go ahead with the information at our hands, notwithstanding the comprehensive statement of the Senator from Indiana when the bill was taken up, I fear we are liable to take some steps that we will regret in the future.

In regard to the information that has heretofore been furnished on the tariff proposition that has nothing to do with the present consideraton of this measure; but I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that every day almost during the discussion of the tariff act which we last passed there was laid upon our desks the most exhaustive information published every twenty-four hours upon every detail of every schedule of that tariff bill, and no man voted in this Chamber except he voted with a full knowledge of all the information that that committee in weeks and months of study were able to get together. We have not had a scintilla——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not care to be interrupted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is speaking by my courtesy; but go ahead.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, we have not from the Committee on Territories one single line to show the necessity of this legislation, to show the facts upon which it is based, or to show why it should be taken up at this time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think I have the floor. Will the Senator permit me just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am compelled to answer something the Senator said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In his very earnest appeal for a report of the committee in addition to the statement of the chairman, the Senator referred to the fact that an infinitely more important measure was reported without any written report last year. I did not then hear the Senator demand any report on the tariff bill from the Committee on Finance. The Senator says that day by day exhaustive information was prepared overnight and laid before the Senate. Mr. President, that is true; but was any of it prepared overnight and laid before the Senate at the request of the Senator from Wyoming? I myself had something to do with those requests, but I did not hear the Senator at that time demanding the preparation overnight of any information concerning the tariff bill, or any phrase or item of it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The information covered all the ground, and——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was far from covering the ground. But, even such as it was, who asked for it? Not the Senator from Wyoming.

But let us clear this matter up. Will the Senator state to the committee, the Senate's servant—and no committee of this body is more anxious to be its servant and the servant of every Senator—will the Senator please indicate just what information he thinks is lacking from the statement of the chairman, and the committee will supply it overnight?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have no fault to find with the statement of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Thank you.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was lucid, as always; it was comprehensive and extended; but what I want to see in connection with this bill is a report of the Committee on Territories attached to the bill and presented to the Senate in the orderly way in which committee reports are ordinarily made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with reference to that, the Senator from Wyoming has had much more experience and longer service than I have; but he speaks of "the orderly way." It is not universal to make reports with reference to bills; in fact, I suppose it is not customary to make them with most bills. The Senator from Wyoming knows better than I do, for he is an older and a more learned and experienced Senator than I, that many bills are presented without even a report or an opening statement, and information comes through the discussion on the floor of the Senate. The Senator also knows better than I that very few bills have as full a statement as even the poor remarks of the chairman of the committee with reference to this bill, which the chairman stated that he made for the committee in lieu of a report.

I suggested to the Senator that if he wanted any information which the committee can furnish, we are very glad indeed, upon request, to put all the agencies of the Government that we can command at his disposition, and to furnish him with it as the bill goes along. What is desired, Mr. President, this afternoon, and nothing more, is that the bill proceed in the regular course for reading and for consideration of the committee amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. As has been suggested, this bill was brought out of committee on last Monday morning, and before printing was made the special order of business. There is no report accompanying the bill, save the statement of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. I do not understand that that statement was intended to be in the nature of a report, as we ordinarily use and understand that term.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was so stated in the statement.

Mr. BORAH. I understood it was stated in the statement; but when you come to read the statement, you are merely reading the statement of the Senator from Indiana. The fact is, there was nothing stated in the statement of the Senator from Indiana as to why this change of government was proposed to be had in the district of Alaska.

This is a peculiar and an extraordinary bill. It may be necessary; there may be conditions there which warrant it; but certainly we are not prepared at this time to consider the question, because there is no information before the Senate as to why this change is proposed. This is a bill which provides, in the first place, for a governor, an attorney-general, and a commissioner of mines; and, in the second place, for eight councilmen, to be appointed by the President. The right of self-government, the power of the people of Alaska to express themselves, is effectively cut out of this entire scheme of government.

As I have said, there may be conditions prevailing in the district of Alaska, where some 40,000 American citizens reside, which warrant and justify this Congress in taking away from them all semblance of self-government; but before we proceed to do that, before we establish and engraft upon the American system the colonial doctrine of England in its simplest form, we ought to have a thorough statement of this matter before the Senate. For that reason I trust that the Senator from Indiana will not insist upon taking up this bill until either a report is made or until other Senators, who are not members of this committee, have an opportunity to know the reasons why and the wherefores for this peculiar and extraordinary form of government which is proposed to be given to the people of the district of Alaska.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President—I beg the Senator's pardon; I will not interrupt him. I thought he was through.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I had yielded to the Senator from Idaho, and still have the floor; but I thought the Senator was through, and I was going to answer the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was simply going to add further that if the Senator from Indiana is not prepared to make a report, I hope he will give us time to make our own investigation. I think this is a very important matter. I do not say now that I shall not vote for the bill, but I say that there will have to be most extraordinary and conclusive facts to justify a favorable vote upon this measure, conceiving it to be, as I do, unfriendly to every principle of our institutions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, there are several propositions made, and I will answer them in their order.

The first one was that the bill was reported out on Monday last and made the unfinished business. The first answer to that is that there was no other unfinished business before the Senate and no proposition to make anything else the unfinished business, although, as the Senator from Idaho, the whole Senate, and the whole country well know, there are other committees that have had bills of vast importance before them for a considerable time. So, Mr. President, in the interest of public business, and that the Senate might have something to proceed with after the morning hour, this bill was made the unfinished business.

The second answer is that it was made the unfinished business on a motion adopted by the Senate without a dissenting voice.

The third answer is that that motion on that day could not have been made except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me. After the question had been discussed as to whether or not the motion should be made, nobody objected to the making of the motion. So the motion was made, and the Senate itself by vote made this bill the unfinished business because it desired to do so. It had nothing else to make the unfinished business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me. Mr. President, it has been said that there has not yet been given a single reason why this measure should be either favorably reported or favorably considered, notwithstanding the chairman of the committee had at some length gone over, and accurately gone over, the situation in Alaska with reference to its physical characteristics, the vast distances there, the number of people, the proportion of men to women, the business in which those people were engaged, their wide separation over a territory as large as between one-fifth and one-sixth of the United States, to wit, 600,000 square miles almost, which is eight times the area of the Senator's State, with not more and probably less than 30,000 white people scattered in clumps over that enormous territory, with very difficult means of communication overland, and even by water, except in the southeastern part; after all that had been stated, the chairman pointed out comprehensively—not, perhaps, using so much language as might have been used—that for forty years Congress had been legislating for that district; that there was naturally and inevitably a jumble of laws, some harmonious, some inharmonious, some inapplicable, and some applicable, only two of which may be said to be thoroughly excellent, to wit, the criminal and civil code, enacted about ten years ago, and the most admirable and necessary law prepared by and reported and its passage secured by the subcommittee of the Committee on Territories which visited Alaska and made the most exhaustive and learned report upon conditions there ever made as yet; that in this state of affairs, considering the population, where it is located, what it is engaged in, the difficulty of communication, and so forth, it became evident that there must be a body of men who could be on the ground and who could make a uniform set of laws to be submitted to Congress, that legislative body to be safeguarded in every way that legislative ingenuity could suggest. So the Senator will find that there were large basic reasons given for this legislation.

I think the Senator will find it was also mentioned that it has been proposed that the legislative council should be elected by the people; but, as was stated in a single sentence—a single sentence is enough in the view of this committee, because it embraces the whole thing—that on account of the fewness of the number of the people, the enormous extent of the land in which they live, their difficulty of communication, the impossibility of any such thing as a solidarity and unity of public sentiment, the election of a legislature by the people who live there was not a practicable proposition.

So, I submit, Mr. President—not to go over again the statement then made—that the Senator from Idaho hardly does justice to the committee or to its chairman in stating that no reason at all for the passage of this bill had been given and that no facts were before the Senate. It will be found that the facts contained in this short statement are quite full. Whether they are accurate is something which any Senator can question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is proposed this afternoon, I will say, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, and I shall have concluded, is merely that the Senate proceed with the reading of the bill, which they have made the unfinished business, and the consideration of the committee amendments in the usual way, not at all for its disposition finally. The chairman of this committee has been in the Senate too long to either expect or desire any such rapid disposition of any measure. I expect and hope that it will receive the very fullest consideration at the hands of the Senate itself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana stated on Monday last many reasons why there should be legislation for the district of Alaska, but I still think, if the Senator will review his statement, that he has given us no reason why this peculiar kind of legislation should be enacted; and that is the one thing concerning which we are most interested and the one vital matter in this entire bill. I was not complaining particularly because the Senator had the bill made the unfinished business, but rather reciting the fact to show that there was no opportunity, and had been no opportunity, for any Senator here to familiarize himself either with the contents of the bill or the reasons for the bill after he was familiar with it.

I undertook to inform myself to some extent last night as to the contents of the bill. I think I know what the bill contains. I am still more at a loss, however, to know why it should contain the provisions which it does. There must have been some controlling and imperative reason in the minds of the committee. I am quite sure that no member of the committee would care for this kind of legislation ordinarily. I am quite sure that there is not a very large American territory over which they would want to extend this kind of a government. There must be, therefore, peculiar conditions and extraordinary conditions in Alaska to warrant this kind of legislation.

To speak without detail to-day and candidly, in my opinion there is a controlling and important reason for this legislation; and if it was all known, there would not be any danger of the legislation going through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have been looking over my statement, which was made on behalf of the committee in lieu of a report. It was made after consultation with other members of the committee also. There will be found there the large and general reasons for the enactment of this legislation. Senators must not think because either a report or a statement is not extensive that it does not contain the facts and the reasons. I think it is true that all of us have the experience, as we go on in the Senate from month to month and from year to year——

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just a minute. As we go on in the Senate from month to month and from year to year, that all of our work is toward condensation.

The large reasons are given. Things are boiled down. I have given them in the first statement itself, and I have stated them since. There must be some legislative body especially devoted to Alaska. The number of people, their location over a perfectly enormous extent of territory, which makes communication among them difficult physically, in time, and financially, and other reasons given, show that the election of a legislature under those conditions is an impracticable proposition. There are other reasons, too, which might be given, and will be, if necessary; but the ones already presented are conclusive and compelling.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Is it not a fact, Mr. President, that hearings were had before the Committee on Territories upon this bill, particularly a hearing of the Delegate from Alaska, protesting against this legislation?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, and the hearings have been printed. I suppose that as soon as they are bound, they will be on the desk of every Senator. The Delegate made most extraordinary statements.

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; and a most convincing one, too, in the view of the minority of the committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That would be for the judgment of Senators.

Mr. FRAZIER. It was very satisfactory to me, and it certainly convinced me that this extraordinary legislation, which is attempted to be passed through this body, ought not to pass, not only from the statement made by the Delegate who represents those people, but from the statements which were made as to the sentiments of the people, showing that 90 per cent of the residents of Alaska who are American citizens, who went from the States to Alaska, were protesting against this legislation. That report has not been printed; at least, if it has been, I have been unable thus far to obtain a copy of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It has been printed, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator, who is the most fair and generous of men and he would not put anyone in the wrong, that this statement was printed, and it was submitted in the usual form for correction to those who made it, and is now being bound. The reason it has not been laid before the Senate already is because——

Mr. FRAZIER. I was not criticising the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (continuing). Is because of the delay of those who made the statements.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am not criticising the chairman of the committee, Mr. President, with respect to the printing of the hearings, but I am making this suggestion that, in view of the fact that this is extraordinary legislation, very unusual legislation, and, in my judgment, very vicious legislation, the Senate ought not to be pressed to the consideration of this bill until those hearings have been printed and Senators can have an opportunity to examine them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was making a statement in response to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I inquire if the Senator from Tennessee is through?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well; but I might venture this, knowing and appreciating the Senator as I do, that I am sure certain statements of Mr. Wickersham could not have enlisted the enthusiasm of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In just a moment. Now, Mr. President, if it is an impracticable proposition to elect a legislature for this tremendous extent of territory, between a fifth and a sixth of the entire area of the whole United States, with this small number of people in it, then what shall Congress do? Congress can continue as it has been doing. That is impracticable, too. Time has developed that fact. So the idea has been devised by the President of the United States—an idea which has grown out of his great experience, exceeding the experience in matters of this kind of any man in the United States either now or at any time in its history—that a legislative council should be provided for by Congress, to be appointed by the President. Such a legislative council would be there and would act practically upon all the matters of legislation which are required to be enacted for that Territory.

The executive members thereof have executive duties very clearly defined in the bill, and to be further enlarged by the legislation which they are expected to pass and to submit to Congress. The powers of the legislative council have been safeguarded by this committee by amendment to the very extreme limit—much further than some of the most widely informed and most scrupulously honorable men in the Government think wise. Still we have put those extreme limitations in. I suppose few legislative bodies, either elective or appointive, have ever had so many restrictions thrown around them. In addition to that, their legislation must be laid before Congress for its approval. Such a body as that, appointed by the President of the United States, regardless of what party the President belongs to, regardless of who he is, and subject to his removal, will be, as far as human precaution can make it, absolutely above any selfish consideration, except the consideration of the public service and the good of the Territory which they are serving. That is by no manner of means probable with an elective legislature. Indeed, it is certain not to be true of a legislature elected by the number of people under all the conditions in Alaska. We need not go into the history of what has occurred in the legislatures of our various States to emphasize what might be true of an elective legislature in a country of such enormous interests, material and financial, a legislature elected by clumps of citizens widely separated and few in number.

I say, Mr. President, that the more I think of it the more I am persuaded that large general reasons are given here for this legislation, and, these reasons having been given, it would seem to be the logical and the usual course of those who do not think the legislation wise, in their own time, after they are sufficiently prepared, to lay before the Senate their reasons why the legislation is not wise.

A committee of the Senate has reported this legislation, with the recommendation that it be passed with amendments, and there has been a statement, however incomplete it may be, laid before the Senate in behalf of the committee. This statement was made in lieu of a report, and so stated; it was made in behalf of and for the committee, after consultation with the majority. Nobody has questioned the statement of fact which has been made; nobody has questioned a single reason there given, and in case it should be open to question, then it becomes not only the business but the duty of every Senator who thinks it is open to question to point out its inaccuracies as to fact or its unsoundness as to argument.

Mr. President, this, of course, is more or less upon the merits of the bill itself; but that is not what I am proposing that the Senate shall consider this afternoon. I am proposing merely that we shall proceed with the consideration of the committee amendments for the purpose of perfecting the bill in the ordinary way, and then, when it is perfected, the whole debate can come up upon the merits of the bill itself, or, indeed, it can come up upon any of the amendments. Not only that, but I think the Senator will recognize, I will not say the generosity, although it amounts to that, but the willingness of the committee to accommodate any Senator who may for lack of time, lack of information, or the lack of anything else want the bill not to be considered at any time. As the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, I merely want to make such reasonable progress as is usual; and if the Senator from Idaho or any other Senator would prefer that the unfinished business should be temporarily laid aside in order that he may more completely inform himself I am sure I voice the opinion of the whole committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, in saying that we are willing to do that. There will be no attempt to railroad this bill through, or any other bill of which the chairman of this committee has charge, whether it comes from his committee or any other. I think my course in my short experience in the Senate has demonstrated that to all Senators on both sides.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the last statement of the Senator is more assuring, for all I desire in this matter is time to investigate. The Senator has repeated that the reasons for this proposed legislation were given in his original statement. The difficulty is that that statement does not constitute a discussion of those facts which are necessary for information. In the first place, this bill provides that there shall be a legislative council. The council has got to travel just as far to hold its legislative sessions when it is appointed as it has when it is elected, and the distance and inconvenience are just the same, unless we assume that the men who are going to be appointed are going to have more capactiy to travel than the men who would be elected, which, I think, would likely be true in the district of Alaska.

In the second place, the people of Alaska have been electing a Delegate from that district. The election has been held, the people have been able to get out and cast their votes, and they have sent their Delegate here. It seems to me that, while the Senator seems to be entirely satisfied with his statement, it does not yet reach the proposition why we should take away from those people any expression of their own with reference to their own rights and with reference to the manner in which they should be controlled or in regard to the public servants who shall represent them.

In Alaska there are about 40,000 American citizens. There will be 100,000 American citizens there in a very short time. It is one of the richest countries in the world; it is being thickly settled, and the people there have just as much capacity for self-government individually as any other people in the United States. It may be a little more inconvenient for them to get about to hold their elections; but in the exercise of their judgment and in the display of their patriotism, I apprehend that distances would cut no figure in the matter whatever. The matter of inconvenience is one which they are willing to suffer rather than to give up the right of self-government.

Now, if I could know all the facts with reference to this matter, I might be willing to vote on the bill, but I have asked the Senator to give us time to investigate or else to give us a report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; I shall be very glad to give any Senator all the time he desires, and certainly the Senator from Idaho, whom I would find it difficult in my heart to refuse any personal request he might make. I put only one limitation on that—I will not imperil the passage of the bill. But we have plenty of time, and I will give any Senator all the time he wants at this stage.

Mr. President, I have repeated more than once in the last three days, in response to different Senators, that the committee is not only willing, but glad to give any Senator time, opportunity, or anything else to investigate this subject.

Mr. OWEN rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me a moment. I want to make one statement at least three sentences long.

There is one remark the Senator made that we might just as well thrash out here now. The Delegate from the Territory, to whom he referred, made a statement before the committee in which he said that there were from fifty to seventy-five thousand people there. The statement was later corrected, when submitted to him, to 50,000. So it fell about 20,000 overnight.

According to him, as he now corrects himself, there are 50,000 white miners in Alaska. When asked later whether they were miners, he said "Yes;" and then when asked how many were women, he said he included the women. Then, from two or three sources it was said that the proportion of men to women was 2 to 1, 3 to 1, 4 to 1. I think everybody will be convinced by reading the statements that may be laid before the Senate that the very least that could be said is that there is a proportion of 3 to 1. I hope the Senator will pay attention to what I am going to say about this, because it is coming directly to the point he made, and that is about the election of the members of the council.

The Senator himself says that there are 40,000 white people in Alaska. That is 10,000 less than the Delegate finally said, after correcting his statement, and 30,000 less than the Delegate originally gave as the probable maximum. At any rate, that would make a great many thousand—twenty, twenty-five, or thirty thousand—voters. And yet, at the election for Delegate, when he said there were three candidates running and that there was a most vigorous and unusual campaign made, out of all this vast number of voters—the number was enormous, you see—there were only about 9,000 votes cast for all of the candidates put together, of which he had a plurality—9,000 all put together, combined, added up—9,000 voters in an extent of territory equal to all the United States east of the Mississippi and north of Tennessee—and those 9,000 voters in clumps, separated by hundreds, and even thousands, of miles. So that, Mr. President, in the election that occurred there, taking his statement to be correct, the voters that actually appeared at the polls for all candidates put together, were very few in number, and those that cast their votes for the present Delegate were only a small fraction of the number of people this Delegate said were there capable of voting and very anxious to vote and to have the right of self-government. When asked how he explained that, he said, in substance: "Well, the people did not take any interest." So much for that.

The Senator says there are 40,000 people there. The census shows there were 30,000, and the testimony and statements of men before the committee, very thoroughly conversant and completely disinterested, in Alaska were—and the committee so believes—that that number has decreased since the census, so that now there are in Alaska probably 25,000; certainly not to exceed 30,000.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just a second. Of course any Senator may indulge in prophesy as to how many people there will be there. I hope there will be a hundred thousand, as the Senator forecasts; I hope there will be a million. And if this bill becomes a law, I think there will be a heavy increase. But that is not what we are legislating for. We are legislating for the present and the immediate future, not the remote and speculative future. We are legislating for to-day and for the next decade, not for the decade after that.

Mr. BORAH. I disagree with the Senator. We are legislating for that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We will cross that bridge when we reach it.

Mr. FRAZIER. The census of 1900 showed a population there of about 62,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Including Indians and Eskimos—30,000 whites, and more Indians and Eskimos than there were whites.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator did not let me finish my statement. The census showed that of that number 27,000 were white American citizens.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is less than I thought it was.

Mr. FRAZIER. That was in 1900.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is less than I thought it was. I thought there were 30,000 white people there in 1900.

Mr. FRAZIER. It is not a question of what the Senator thought. I am speaking about the facts. That was back in 1900, ten years ago. We have no information as to what the increase has been since then.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We have evidence that there has been a decrease since then—that there are not so many people there now as then.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator may imagine he has such evidence, but I do not recall it in any hearings that we have had; at any rate, it only demonstrates the importance of having before the Senate the testimony that was taken before the committee upon this bill. The Senator seems to have some inexplicable reason for desiring the hastening of this bill without the publication of those hearings and without a report, and Senators therefore are left to wrangle between themselves as to what the facts presented before the committee really were.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator who is wrangling about that? Does not the Senator agree with me that both Major Richardson and Governor Hoggatt said that the population had decreased since 1900?

Mr. FRAZIER. Governor Hoggatt did not appear before the committee at any meeting which I attended.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was not the committee's fault that the Senator was not present—nor the Senator's, either.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the fact is that after the committee had adjourned and ordered the bill to be reported, Governor Hoggatt was called in.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; he asked to be heard on account of a charge made against him, and the committee extended him the same courtesy that they extended Major Richardson, who appeared under like circumstances. Then the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] asked of Governor Hoggatt a number of very pertinent questions concerning the substance of the matter.

I can not conceive why the Senator speaks about anyone wanting to hurry the bill through without the report. I have stated to the Senator twice, and he accepts my statement, that the hearings before the committee have been printed. The delay in printing them was due to the fact that, as is usually the case and as was requested in this case, the stenographer's reports were submitted to the men who made the statement, chiefly to the Delegate himself. As soon as they were through with them the statements were sent to the printing office and are being bound now.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am not making any criticism of the Senator with respect to that publication. But in view of the ordinary and usual delay in having the publication made, it would seem proper, in order that Senators may have access to the statements, for this bill to be passed over——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will be very glad to have that done.

Mr. FRAZIER. At least until Senators may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall be very glad to have that done. The Senator will do me the justice of saying, as appears in the RECORD, that yesterday the Senator requested me to let the bill be passed over for the day, as a matter of personal convenience, which I immediately did.

Mr. FRAZIER. For which I extend my thanks.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. This is the first request I have had from any Senator that the bill should be passed over further. I want to repeat—and I do not want to have to repeat it again, for I have stated it for the tenth or fifteenth time—that this bill as the unfinished business will be so managed as to meet the convenience of the Senate, of course, which it would have to meet in any event, as well as that of every Senator.

Mr. MONEY. When does the Senator think these papers will be laid before the Senate?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think by to-morrow.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator has no desire to press this matter until the information comes in?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have no desire to press the matter until there is the fullest discussion and the fullest opportunity for every Senator to inform himself and to inquire of the committee for any information or anything else he may want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the liberty of suggesting to the Senator from Indiana that as no consent has been given to dispense with the formal reading of the bill, the only question now before the Senate is the first reading of the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; that is true. That is what I was wanting to have done, so that we may make some reasonable progress. I have stated that I want the bill read and then the committee amendments considered. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator to say that he desired to proceed to the consideration of the amendments.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Perhaps I may have said that, and if so I was inadvertent. I should have made a request for the first reading of the bill. I thought I had done so.

Mr. OWEN. May I ask the privilege of addressing to the Senator from Indiana a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do, indeed.

Mr. OWEN. I am very much indebted to the Senator for permitting me to ask him a question.

I should like to ask if it would be entirely agreeable to the Senator, since this matter will probably not be disposed of for several weeks——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I never said that.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I venture to make an occasional remark without repeating the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You were undertaking to do it, then.

Mr. OWEN. Not at all. I did not say the Senator from Indiana had made any such remark. I ventured to say the bill would probably not be disposed of for several weeks, and I did that upon my own initiative.

Since that is probably true, I was going to ask the Senator from Indiana if he would not find it convenient to make a report upon this matter, setting out particularly the reasons why this council should be appointive rather than elective?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is that your question?

Mr. OWEN. That is the real issue in this bill, I take it, and I think the reasons which are urged for it should be clearly set forth, so as to be considered deliberately and carefully. That is all I was going to suggest.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, that matter has been thrashed out, perhaps before the Senator entered the Chamber. The chairman of the committee the other day, after moving that the bill be made the unfinished business, made a statement which stated the facts and the fundamental reasons—because the reasons are large ones—for this procedure. I have heard as yet no reasons whatever to the contrary. That is all I have to say about that.

Mr. OWEN. The report, then, in effect has been made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It has already been made and will be found in the RECORD. I will say to the Senator that this is very frequently done. It is the usual procedure. Very frequently a bill is reported and a statement is made in lieu of a formal report.

Mr. OWEN. Unquestionably that is true. I was not aware that the Senator had stated the reasons which had led the committee to make this change of policy; and I want to say——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As a matter of fact it is no change of policy.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. I may be able to help the Senator.

Alaska at the present time is in a peculiar condition. If it were in my power, I would give the people of that Territory local self-government. But, Mr. President, I do not believe that any bill can pass either branch of Congress giving to the people of Alaska at the present time an elective legislature. Being firmly convinced of this fact, I feel, on the other hand, that they should have a local legislative body, even though the members thereof be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. As matters stand to-day, the people of the Territory are unable to deal with any local question. They can take no step until authorized by Congress. In this respect they are at a great disadvantage. It is a great Territory of immense wealth, containing fine agricultural lands and immense mineral wealth of almost every conceivable character. It is destined, in my judgment, to be one of the greatest possessions of this country, and yet the people are without any legislative power.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. PILES. Will the Senator permit me to proceed for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to ask a question.

Mr. PILES. I will yield in a very few moments.

There is great necessity in the Territory for the construction of roads and trails, for instance, on a larger scale, in my opinion, than has been authorized by Congress. A body of men familiar with local conditions could deal with this subject much more wisely and much more satisfactorily than Congress.

The people there are without the power of taxation. Railway companies, canning companies, and similar institutions pay nothing for the privileges which they enjoy or the great wealth they take from either soil or sea, except a modest license fee imposed by Congress for the privilege of carrying on business in the Territory. There ought to be a legislative body in the Territory, composed of bona fide citizens, who know the conditions, with authority to enact laws in respect to this and similar subjects.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

Mr. PILES. If the Senator will let me go on in a logical way, I will be glad to yield to him in a moment.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. PILES. I shall be glad to answer any question after I have made the little outline I have in my mind.

Mr. FRAZIER. If the Senator will not yield, that is his privilege.

Mr. PILES. The power of taxation will enable the people to establish more schools, provide for territorial institutions, construct roads and trails, that the mining sections, now inaccessible, may be opened to all. There are, no doubt, hundreds if not thousands of acres of placer "diggins" in the Territory awaiting the pick and the shovel, which can not be worked because there are no means of transportation to them.

But, Mr. President, as I said at the outset, there is, in my judgment, no possibility of a bill passing either branch of Congress giving to the people of Alaska the power to elect a local legislature.

The President in his recent message to Congress expressed his views on this subject in the following language:

> With respect to the Territory of Alaska, I recommend legislation which shall provide for the appointment by the President of a governor and also of an executive council, the members of which shall during their term of office reside in the Territory, and which shall have legislative powers sufficient to enable it to give to the Territory local laws adapted to its present growth. I strongly deprecate legislation looking to the election of a territorial legislature in that vast district. The lack of permanence of residence of a large part of the present population and the small number of the people who either permanently or temporarily reside in the district as compared with its vast expanse and the variety of the interests that have to be subserved make it altogether unfitting, in my judgment, to provide for a popular election of a legislative body. The present system is not adequate and does not furnish the character of local control that ought to be there. The only compromise, it seems to me, which may give needed local legislation and secure a conservative government is the one I propose.

The bill now under consideration carries out in a large measure the views of the President, who wants to aid the people of Alaska. Under the provisions of the bill more than two-thirds of the legislative council will be bona fide citizens and legal voters of the Territory. The eight resident members will have the power to override the governor's veto. This bill confers greater power than the people of Alaska ever possessed before. It does not grant all the power a great many of the people of the Territory demand, but it gives them a large voice—something they never had before—in their own affairs. It will, I feel confident, lead to the enactment of a law giving to the people of that Territory all of the powers possessed by other Territories of the United States. I say this because there are no better men in any of the States of the Union than those who reside in Alaska.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PILES. Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who first asked me to yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator before he sits down, Is there any reason why these people should not elect their legislature or council other than the mere fact of distance?

Mr. PILES. No and yes. I may say to the Senator that it has been said that an undesirable element will control to a very large extent elections in Alaska. A large part of my life was spent in the Territories, and we must all admit that the element to which I have referred sometimes controlled our local politics. But the better men of the community rose in the end and asserted their citizenship.

I do not know whether such a condition prevails in Alaska, but we must not forget that the Territory is in a formative state. It is remote from the mainland of the United States proper. Railroad work to a very great extent must be carried on by men temporarily sojourning in the Territory.

It was charged that in the last election for territorial delegate that some 2,000 or 3,000 votes were cast at a railroad camp in Alaska by men who had no permanent residence in the Territory. Whether the charge be true or false, I do not know. I saw it in the newspapers, or some one made that statement to me.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Washington think that that is any different charge from that made as to every city election that takes place in the United States everywhere?

Mr. PILES. No; I do not.

Mr. BORAH. It is one of the charges that accompany every election.

Mr. PILES. To a very large extent; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator a question. Do I understand that the criminal element, to use less delicate language than the Senator from Washington used, is so completely in possession of the district of Alaska that we must deprive the nine or ten thousand who do exercise the franchise there of the rights of American citizenship in order to control the situation?

Mr. PILES. I hope the Senator from Idaho did not understand me as saying that the criminal element is in control in Alaska, because I do not think it is. I never said it was, but I said that some people claimed—that was my language——

Mr. BORAH. Who are they? Who claims that the undesirable citizens are so in control of Alaska that we can not give the American citizens there the right of self-government?

Mr. PILES. I am not one of those who claim it.

Mr. BORAH. You are a member of the committee.

Mr. PILES. Yes; and I reserved certain rights in committee to move to amend this bill when it came up for consideration.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, there must be some respectable——

Mr. PILES. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that I believe the people of Alaska to be capable of local self-government; that they are capable of electing a legislature that will give them local self-government along the lines which they desire. That is my personal opinion. But I do not believe that Congress will at this time pass a law giving them that privilege.

Mr. BORAH. I understand now why it is we have no committee report—because there is such a wide difference of opinion among the members of the committee. Here is one member who says that they are not capable of exercising local self-government and another who thinks they are.

Mr. PILES. I have heard no member of the committee say that those people of Alaska were incapable of local self-government.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, then why not give it to them?

Mr. PILES. On account of certain local conditions and not on account of the fact that they are incapable of local self-government, for no one contends that they are incapable.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I suggest that perhaps it might meet the convenience of all, and at the same time make reasonable and usual progress with the bill, if we had the first reading of the bill, and then after that that it be temporarily laid aside; just the reading of the bill, not also action on the committee amendments, as at first suggested.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, before any definite steps are taken——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understood that the Senator from Indiana had yielded the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; but it is all right. I asked for the reading of the bill. Let the Senator proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is entitled to the floor in his own right.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, before any definite step is taken that will commit the Senate to the consideration of this bill at any particular time, I think it well that it should be insisted upon that all the data bearing on this question shall be before the Senate. There seem to be a considerable number of opinions, differing widely in their estimate, as to what is the population and the character of the population in that so-called "Territory." The census for 1910 has already been taken. It is insisted by the Delegate that it was taken without warrant of law. On the other hand, the Director of the Census maintained that he took it at a time which would bring about the best, the most thorough, and the most reliable results.

There are those of us, at least one member of that committee, who insist that there is no possible occasion for the passage of this bill in either form, either with an elective council or an appointive council; that the population of the Territory is situated in three principal mining camps, or cities or towns incident to the fishing industry or the mining industry; that they are isolated one from the other by impassable barriers, with a minimum distance of probably 250 miles; that there is no possible coherence in the population; that there is none of that continuity of sentiment which is necessary to produce an enlightened public opinion which must be concreted into law for the government of that population; that it lacks that homogeneity which is necessary to constitute a permanent community.

Alaska is now in a formative stage, limited to far distant communities, having no interest in or knowledge of what is going on in the one or the other. It appears from a report made by a committee of the Senate which visited that Territory in 1905 that it is necessary to travel 3,500 miles by existing modes of transportation in order to reach a given point in that Territory. All of those things ought to be considered.

The mere fact that a few American citizens have assembled there for temporary purposes does not create the necessity for conferring upon any local board the power to legislate. There is nothing to legislate about. They can only do harm. They can only complicate and burden the situation in a territory which properly preserved and conserved may be of vast benefit to this country. Alaska is a vast storehouse of natural resources—timber and minerals. It is a question whether the Territory will be useful for any other purpose. The evidence in this record as to the agricultural pursuits of Alaska is that a resident of Fairbanks came into possession of a handful of German wheat, and having planted this there, and successfully matured it, he thereby secured enough seed to plant a single acre of wheat for the present year, which constitutes the wheat-growing area of Alaska, according to the statement of Governor Hoggatt; that the snow disappears about the 1st of May and reappears about the 1st of September; and that only such crops as can be planted and matured within that short season are a possibility there.

There is nothing before the Senate, and there will not be until we know the contents of the present census—of course, there is the report that was submitted by a committee which visited that Territory and spent there some two months or more, a committee composed of some of the most painstaking and conscientious and industrious Members of the Senate—to disclose how many people there are in the Territory, how they are related one to the other, or what reasons exist for this proposed delegation of power to any body.

Mr. President, it is not necessary in the Senate to make any comment upon a border population or a mining-camp population. Such a population possesses its own characteristics, and they are well known. The fact that there were 10,000 miners there at a given date constitutes no valid ground for saying there are 10,000, or any part of that number, there to-day, because, as was abundantly established by the hearings, it is a migratory population, which leaves with the approach of the winter season, and an entirely different population returns with the appearance of spring.

I think there ought to be exceedingly great care in proceeding with this bill, and that we ought to have all the reliable and efficient data that can be gotten which would have a tendency to demonstrate the necessity for its enactment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very cheerfully.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand that all of the testimony taken before the committee, to support what the Senator has so effectively presented here, is being printed?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is printed now.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It will be on Senators' desks to-morrow. That has been stated here.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I feel that we should have that testimony and have an opportunity to very carefully study it before we undertake to commit ourselves to the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In addition to that we ought to have some fair synopsis of the census. It can be prepared without waiting for the entire returns. I think we should have the outline of it, showing the population, its character, its location, and so forth. We will then find out that instead of this cry of "home rule" having any merit at all in support of one legislature, it can just as effectively be made in favor of four legislatures, because there are four communities in that Territory which know as little about each other as the citizens of New Orleans know about what is going on in St. Louis. That is about the average distance of separation. The only difference is that New Orleans and St. Louis are in communication by telegraph, whereas the Alaskan points are separated by insurmountable barriers of ice or streams.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator that it was stated before he entered the Chamber that the data and the so-called "hearings" before our committee—the value of which Senators can judge when they read them—have been printed and will be on the desks as soon as they are bound. They are very brief. I now ask that the first reading of the bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Before we enter upon that I want some order taken to procure from the Director of the Census an intelligent abstract of the census.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator, if he will let me interrupt him, that I shall confer with the Director of the Census immediately after the bill shall have been read.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The bill will not be disposed of until we can get the information?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not; but in the regular and ordinary way.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator, however, that upon the question of the population and its nature and where located there was very definite information given by two disinterested persons who appeared before the committee—Major Richardson and Governor Hoggatt—and the chairman in his opening statement followed their information, which is at first hand. The Delegate, as I said before the Senator from South Dakota entered the Chamber, gave an estimate of population of from fifty to seventy thousand, as he said in his first statement. When he came to correct it, overnight, he struck out the "seventy" and left it at fifty thousand.

My own opinion, taking the last census and taking the statement of these two witnesses, who have no interest whatever in either magnifying or minimizing the population, is that it probably has decreased, and there are now probably between twenty-five and twenty-seven thousand whites in the whole Territory, of which the proportion of men to women is probably about three to one; perhaps a greater proportion than that—possibly four to one. Three or four white men to one white woman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; but I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it is pertinent just now, while the discussion is being had, to ask a question simply for information. Is there any specific grievance or objection to the form of government which prevails there now, and which is being applied to the conditions in the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, yes; very great, very great, indeed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What are they?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very great. I have given them in my statement, which the Senator did not hear. I think the best way of proceeding—and it will meet with the convenience of all Senators—will be, first, to have the bill read, and then after it is read and the reading is out of the way I shall ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the remainder of the day.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, just a moment. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that there is a misprint in the title of the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I know what the Senator refers to. If the Senator will turn to the end of the bill he will find the title corrected from "District" to "Territory." At the end is the usual form of amendment of the title.

Mr. HUGHES. I myself moved the amendment, and it was adopted when the bill was read in the committee, using the word "Territory" instead of "District."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is here. The Senator will find it in the usual form at the end of the bill:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to create a legislative council in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes."

That is what the Senator refers to? It is the usual form.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It appears at the end of the bill instead of the beginning, as is the usual form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the original text of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I now ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, without prejudice, to be taken up at the regular time to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 27, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 26, 1910.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. In the announcement of the committees the name of Representative AIKEN, who has for some sessions of Congress been a member of the Committee on Pensions, was dropped from the list of the membership of that committee and other committee assignments given to him. In consequence of the death of one of the minority members upon that committee the personnel of the Committee on Pensions desires to have the vacancy filled, and asks that Mr. AIKEN be reappointed. The Chair accordingly will fill the vacancy by appointing Mr. AIKEN a member of that committee.

COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS NO. 1.

Mr. KNAPP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 331.

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 1 be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the House to the fact that on the Private Calendar there appears Senate joint resolution No. 59, of date of January 25, providing for the filling of vacancies to occur in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress. This is a public bill, and undoubtedly should be upon the House Calendar. The Chair therefore directs the change.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, as that is a matter of election by the Senate and the House, as the terms of these gentlemen expire, I think, to-morrow or next day, it seems to me that would be a proper matter to pass by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts misapprehends the scope of the joint resolution. As the Chair gathers from the title, it is proposed to dispense with Members of Congress upon the Board of Regents.

Mr. McCALL. I think that is a misprint. I would like to have the Clerk, if I may, read the resolution. I do not think that is the purpose of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. In any event, it occurs to the Chair that it ought to be on the House Calendar. It is a joint resolution. It is not a concurrent resolution. The Chair therefore directs the transfer to the House Calendar.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 17500, the fortifications appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the fortifications appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, without objecting now, I desire to know from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] if there is anything in the way of amendments that the House, he thinks, will seriously object to, whether they have increased this appropriation very much. In other words, I would like to know whether there is anything that the House would like to consider separate and apart, rather than to have the matter go to conference and to have the report of the conference committee voted up or down, as conference reports have to be voted up or down.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have no knowledge of any such amendment as the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. There have been some increases, have there not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not desire to interfere, but I ask the gentleman from Iowa if the member of the minority on the Committee on Appropriations is present?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think the ranking member of the minority is not present. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], however, is present, and he is a member of the committee. I think he will be in favor of this procedure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand there may be some increases in the appropriations for ammunition in the insular possessions.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I know this is usual, and I have no disposition to object to the usual course. Not having had time to examine what the amendments are, I do not want to get the matter where we can not have a free discussion and a vote on the amendments which would be objectionable to Members of the House or to any considerable body of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that I think if anything of that kind arises, the House will be given full opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The Chair announced the following conferees on the part of the House:

Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. GRAFF, Mr. SHERLEY.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution to increase the efficiency of the Military Academy;

S. J. Res. 12. Joint resolution adjusting the status of certain officers of the army as to their period of service required by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1882, to entitle an army officer to retirement on his own application;

S. 5451. An act to amend the act approved December 21, 1904, entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the Yakima Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington;"

S. 5125. An act authorizing the creation of an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be known as the "Vale land district;"

S. 4780. An act for the relief of the heirs of George A. Armstrong;

S. 4567. An act to amend section 2763 of the Revised Statutes, and for the better enforcement of the navigation laws; and

S. 3905. An act for the relief of the Merritt & Chapman Derrick and Wrecking Company.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 17500) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14464) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIX, Senate joint resolutions and bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution to increase the efficiency of the Military Academy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. J. Res. 12. Joint resolution adjusting the status of certain officers of the army as to their period of service, required by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1882, to entitle an army officer to retirement on his own application—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 5451. An act to amend the act approved December 21, 1904, entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the Yakima Indian Reservation in the State of Washington"—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 5125. An act authorizing the creation of an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be known as the "Vale land district"—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4780. An act for the relief of the heirs of George A. Armstrong—to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 4567. An act to amend section 2763 of the Revised Statutes, and for the better enforcement of the navigation laws—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

S. 3905. An act for the relief of the Merritt & Chapman Derrick and Wrecking Company—to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4089. To authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River and to establish it as a post-road.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16223. An act extending the time for certain homesteaders' residence upon their lands.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. This being calendar Wednesday, the call rests with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and there comes over as unfinished business the bill H. R. 12315.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that we proceed with the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12315) to regulate and prevent the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of alien women and girls for immoral purposes, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that by unanimous consent debate was limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it was also agreed that amendments might be offered at any time during debate.

The SPEAKER. And that amendments might be offered by any gentleman having the floor.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments to be pending until the close of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 11, after the word "within," insert the words "the district in."

On page 6, line 11, after the word "to," insert "the date of her entry into the United States, the port through which she entered."

Amend by adding at the end of section 6 the following:

"No person shall be excused from furnishing the statement as required by this section on the ground or for the reason that the statement so required by him or the information therein contained might tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture under any law of the United States for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing, concerning which he may truthfully report in such statement as required by the provisions of this section."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I want to make an inquiry. Under this arrangement do I understand that amendments may be offered now, or can the bill be amended when it is considered under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MANN. We are in the House, and the bill is not to be considered under the five-minute rule. Under the arrangement amendments were to be offered by anyone having the floor and to be considered as pending when debate closed and voted upon at the end of general debate.

Mr. KEIFER. Do I understand they can not be offered after general debate closes?

Mr. MANN. That was the order of the House, that the previous question should operate at the end of two hours' time.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I should like, then, to offer an amendment now, so that it can be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House, the Chair is informed that any gentleman having the floor can offer an amendment, which is to be regarded as pending. Under the order there is no provision, the Chair is informed, for amendments other than as indicated by the agreement which is the order of the House, and that the previous question will operate on all amendments pending at the close of two hours to the final passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will at the proper time yield to the gentleman from Ohio, so that he will have an opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia] at this time desires to offer an amendment, and for that purpose I yield temporarily.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It is simply for the purpose of offering an amendment, and that is to strike out of the bill, beginning on page 5, line 20, at the words "every person," down to and including the word "otherwise," on page 7.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk suggests the gentleman from Georgia will please submit his amendment in writing. Will the gentleman from Georgia forward his amendment to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will do so later.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, this is not peculiarly a speakable subject. It does not appeal to the "divine afflatus" to come and abide with us to generate and dispense rhetoric and eloquence, especially when, like an intermittent fever, this matter comes up and goes off once a week in passing from one calendar Wednesday to another, and that, too, when the discussion relates to a series of revolting immoralities, and involves the still more revolting atrocity of violating the Constitution of our great Republic in derogation of the authority and dignity of the sovereign States from which alone it derives its beneficent character, greatness, and power.

There are two errors which seem to deserve notice. One is some Members, not versed in parliamentary law, are charging that the purpose of calendar Wednesday was to give the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the center of the stage and permit it to do legislative stunts; the other, widely prevalent among people, newspapers, and preachers and some other good men and women who favor this legislation (some good Congressmen being stampeded also by the notion), that the purpose of this legislation is to stamp out prostitution and immorality, and that it can only be done through congressional action.

The first error is a great one. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has always done business and would do business under any system of rules. If any other committee will get down to work and merit the attention of the House it will receive it. In fact, my opinion is that if any other committee ever does the work done by our committee, it will be an event equal in celebrity and importance to the advent of the great Julius; and, if necessary, it would not be asking too much in behalf of such committee not only to amend our rules to provide a second calendar Wednesday, but to amend the Julian calendar and put more days in the week and more weeks in the year.

The second error is widespread, if not deep seated, and without much excuse for arising to mislead or vex anybody. Members of Congress who take an oath to support the Constitution, who are presumed to know what the Constitution is, certainly ought not to be stampeded by a squeamish sentimentality and blinded to their plain duty. If this bill looked to the protection of female virtue we would unanimously support it. But no such pretense even is made.

The only professed and possible purpose of this legislation is to purify interstate commerce, making character the test. Of course, carried to the last analysis, that proposition would endeavor to exclude all vile and impure people from the use of interstate facilities for commerce. Then there would be a wide field of different opinion as to who was vile and impure and what practices constituted immorality. If gambling contracts are to be denied transmission in commerce, and, as a parallel case, people who buy a ticket to go out of the State for prostitution can be denied facilities for transportation, then people ought not to be allowed to ride in an interstate train to attend a lottery or bet on a horse race. Some other righteous people would deny a ticket to people who wanted to ride on a train to go to a dance or attend a prize fight. There would be no end to the various matters which different opinions would denounce as improper subjects to enjoy interstate-commerce facilities.

It would be utterly impossible, and could not be effectively accomplished by the only conceivable method of searching the conscience of the purchaser. Attaching pains and penalties would have no effect.

If a man intended either to tell the truth or be detected in a falsehood, he would contrive some way to avoid buying the ticket himself, which would be easy enough. If it were constitutional and according to sound policy to deny interstate transportation to those who had been impure, or expected to become so, the determination of character should not depend on the purchase of a ticket, a thing in itself perfectly harmless, in essence and character designed for no harmful purpose, and indicating on its face nothing sinful, inherent, nor bad purpose attendant.

The prohibition should be directed squarely against the immoral person using transportation, whether tested by current actual vice flagrante in transit or by past impurity or by contemplated immorality.

It is fair to assume that the greatest imaginable stretch of federal authority in the premises would be to prohibit immoral conduct in transit. That is not even attempted in this bill for the sufficient reason that the immorality would be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the State in which it occurred.

There is one feature in the fourth section that the most unconstitutional tyro in constitutional law would necessarily know enough to balk at: The specification of eighteen years under which girls shall not be abducted or seduced. What the age of a girl has to do with the purity of commerce is difficult to imagine. I think the Supreme Court even could be unanimous on that question. The several States generally enact and enforce laws on that question, and all should do it. If there is not sufficient law in the Districts and Territories subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, we ought to provide them; but I have never heard nor had reason to believe that laws and morals are any better in those places than in the States, where domestic concerns are properly regarded and safeguarded.

We do not object, but rather insist that Congress legislate, if more legislation is necessary, to regulate and, as much as possible, restrict the admission of aliens to this country and exercise jurisdiction over them pending their coming and while being distributed to their various destinations throughout the country until they become settled and intermingled with the people of the various communities. After they become a part of our population without violating the laws of the United States, then, in common among the people with whom they live, they become and remain subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of local authority as to morals and police regulations.

Constitutional lawyers differ on constitutional questions. "Like priest, like people." The courts differ on the same lines that mark the dissensions between the constitutional lawyers. Judges are only human. Environment, training, heredity, politics, color their visions, prejudice their minds, and unconsciously fix upon them opinions which they valiantly defend and think are honest.

Very few decisions of our court involving constitutional questions have been unanimous, but the difference usually is not on what the Constitution is but on the application and construction of the law which is being measured by the Constitution. For instance, distinguished gentlemen who have argued in behalf of the constitutionality of the pending bill concede all the propositions upon which we insist as to the unconstitutionality of certain things, but insist that provisions in this bill do not fit the case. They admit that all police powers are reserved to the States, and that under the Constitution the unlimited control and regulation of commerce must be exercised for that purpose and not be invoked as a mere sham and pretense to break down local authority, but they deny that anything in this bill will interfere with the exercise of any power reserved to the States. They freely admit, however, that the purpose of this bill is not to stamp out prostitution, and on the abstract proposition that Congress has no power to legislate directly for the prevention of prostitution and other immorality I have no doubt that all the constitutional lawyers and the Supreme Court would make a unanimous opinion. What I wish to make clear here to the Members of this House, to the press, and to the people is that the purpose of this bill is not to stamp out prostitution, nor do its advocates so contend. Getting that out of your mind, then what is the purpose of this legislation? There was an investigation and partial report by the Immigration Commission. There is already considerable immigration law on the subject, a part of which is the following:

IMMIGRATION LAW.

(Approved February 20, 1907.)

SEC. 3. That the importation into the United States of any alien woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, is hereby forbidden; and whoever shall, directly or indirectly, import, or attempt to import, into the United States, any alien woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or whoever shall hold, or attempt to hold, any alien woman or girl for any such purpose in pursuance of such illegal importation, or whoever shall keep, maintain, control, support, or harbor in any house or other place for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, any alien woman or girl within three years after she shall have entered the United States shall, in every such case, be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof be imprisoned not more than five years and pay a fine of not more than $5,000; and any alien woman or girl who shall be found an inmate of a house of prostitution, or practicing prostitution, at any time within three years after she shall have entered the United States shall be deemed to be deported as provided by sections 20 and 21 of this act.

That looks like some law on the subject.

They investigated immigration conditions, found a great many horrible cases of vice, debauchery, and imposition. I confess that I have no such morbid taste as to delight in reading and recounting them here or elsewhere, but they showed that in most of the cases conviction of guilty people had been had, or bonds forfeited, many had been punished, and many thousands of dollars turned into the Treasury from fines and forfeitures. They show that in several of the large cities great improvements have been made by the rigid enforcement of the law; that such evils and crimes have been greatly decreased and driven out of several large cities; that, in other words, when justice was defeated and crime permitted to run riot it was the fault of the officers. Courts and the police officers were, in such cases, given severe castigation by the report, showing clearly where the evil lies in those cases and where the remedy should be applied. An examination of the instances cited ought to convince any reflecting mind of the facility with which all these cases can be met by existing law, federal or state.

Police court records and a little promiscuous reading could have furnished the commission with more and worse information about vile conditions here and in Europe than their partial report discloses. Weakness and iniquity have always been in the world since the loss of Eden, and literature is filled with them in great abundance and infinite variety.

Their references to practices in Europe are exceedingly mild in the light of history and literature, and taken as the only evidence would indicate great improvement. Certainly they do not show conditions in this country to be as bad as in other countries or in other ages. The truth is we are vastly better morally than the balance of the world, which is itself growing better, and we are constantly improving and elevating the world. The publication of such vile stuff is not advisable. A few dirty things printed in the report of the late "Homes Commission" provoked such a protest as to result in its suppression. In most of the state courts the public is excluded from the hearing of vulgar and immoral cases.

The demands of improving morals as well as advancement in public taste have provided and placed within the reach of the young and the virtuous expurgated editions of all the "loudest" literature which may have heretofore been tolerated only on account of the great excellence of the writing, and in some cases on account of scientific and educational matters they contained and taught. The chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, in the course of a speech in this House yesterday, stated that the white-slave traffic had practically been stamped out of our large cities.

But that commission made certain recommendations for the improvement of the administrative features of the Immigration Bureau, to which I have no objection. It also made a number of wise recommendations as to amendments in the law, which I do not oppose. The tenth recommendation, that the legislatures of the States "enact more stringent laws concerning prostitution," was accompanied by no particulars or reasons. If any State in this Republic has failed to enact such laws, it is a very great dereliction in duty, but as the report specifies no State as delinquent I am unable either to concur or dissent in the recommendation.

If any man lives in a State which fails in its duty to enact such laws, I submit that under our system of government his first great duty is at home. Let him go to work and appeal to his people to do their duty providing for the suppression of vice and the protection of morality. That course is far more patriotic and more in conformity with his oath of office than to come here confessing to such pusillanimous dereliction in his own State in the performance of its duty as a State of this great Union and seeking to cast on Congress the unnatural, improper, unconstitutional, and wholly unnecessary burden of legislating to do the work which his people at home ought to do.

There is a practice of piling up recitals of filth and iniquity on some subject and then, instead of cleaning it out by prosecution, which is shown to be effective when resorted to, running to Congress for more legislation.

Now, I realize that some people have run mad on centralization, often those raised in new States created by Congress, erroneously looking upon Congress as their creator, instead of regarding it as the creature of the States, their useful servant, that ought to be treated properly and allowed to perform its proper constitutional functions without being overburdened with work never intended for it. I know that some people scout the idea of states rights as heretical, treasonable, akin to secession and rebellion, except when their own financial interests are involved. Then they hasten to invoke the doctrine of states rights. They feel like calling out the army and navy to suppress red-handed rebellion when a man refers to the Constitution and invokes the good old-time doctrine of our fathers, that States ought to take care of the morals of the country and not overload Congress with unnecessary burdens never intended for it.

As a member of the Federal Government I protest against the reckless injustice of piling up work here impossible for this Government to perform, never intended for it to perform, and which it is never called upon to perform except through ignorance or improper motive. A man who swears to support the Constitution should remember that the Constitution makes this a dual government—the Federal Government, with prescribed rights and duties, and a number of state governments, charged with the balance—the great body—of the duties and clothed with all the balance—the great body—of the rights and powers not expressly prescribed and specified as delegated to the Federal Government.

A new State is elevated to the sublime height of sovereignty occupied by the original States. Its creation should not degrade the character and standing of the old States by relieving them of the responsibility or depriving them of rights and power. On the contrary, the new State is clothed with the rights and powers and charged with the duty of governing the people, regulating the morals, and promoting peace, good order, and happiness in its borders, just like an original State.

Two or three of my brethren last week in this discussion implied, if not expressly admitted, grave doubts as to the constitutionality of this legislation, but said they would resolve the doubt in favor of the legislation, vote for the bill, and throw upon the Supreme Court the task of taking care of the Constitution. That is a very erroneous and very reckless position to take. All doubt ought to be resolved the other way. No Member, under his oath, can afford to vote for a bill unless its constitutionality appears to him clear and unquestioned. One of those distinguished gentlemen, endeavoring to ridicule the unconstitutionality argument unanswerably presented in the minority report, said the minority members were seeing visions. For the enlightenment and edification of this gentleman, for the purpose of setting at rest the question as to whether Congress can legislate for the morals of a State and at the same time showing clearly the dual character of our system of government, with its two fields of operation and usefulness, I quote the following from an opinion in the Keller case (213 U. S.):

> That there is a moral consideration in the special facts of this case, that the act charged is within the scope of the police power, is immaterial, for, as stated, there is in the Constitution no grant to Congress of the police power. And the legislation must stand or fall according to the determination of the question of the power of Congress to control generally dealings of citizens with aliens. In other words, an immense body of legislation, which heretofore has been recognized as peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the States, may be taken by Congress away from them. Although Congress has not largely entered into this field of legislation, it may do so if it has the power. Then we should be brought face to face with such a change in the internal conditions of this country as was never dreamed of by the framers of the Constitution. While the acts of Congress are to be liberally construed in order to enable it to carry into effect the powers conferred, it is equally true that prohibitions and limitations upon those powers should also be fairly and reasonably enforced. (Fairbanks v. United States, 181 U. S., 283; 45 L. ed., 862; 21 Sup. Ct. Rep., 648.) To exaggerate in the one direction and restrict in the other will tend to substitute one consolidated government for the present federal system. We should never forget the declaration in Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700, 725; 19 L. ed., 227, 237), that "the Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States."
> It is unnecessary to determine how far Congress may go in legislating with respect to the conduct of an alien while residing here, for there is no charge against one; nor to prescribe the extent of its power in punishing wrongs done to an alien, for there is neither charge nor proof of any such wrong. So far as the statute or the indictment requires or the testimony shows, she was voluntarily living the life of a prostitute, and was only furnished a place by the defendants to follow her degraded life. While the keeping of a house of ill fame is offensive to the moral sense, yet that fact must not close the eye to the question whether the power to punish therefor is delegated to Congress or is reserved to the State. Jurisdiction over such an offense comes within the accepted definition of the police power. Speaking generally, that power is reserved to the States, for there is in the Constitution no grant thereof to Congress.

Nothing more clearly indicates the doubt and uncertainty in the minds of the proponents of this legislation than the way in which it has been presented and maintained here. Nobody had ever objected to the most drastic and stringent and comprehensive legislation to prevent the admittance into this country of improper immigrants. While we have some laws on the subject which are pretty good and which the report shows have been effectively administered where the people wanted it done, yet we all agree that any amendments necessary to strengthen these laws and their administration should be speedily made and enforced. But the Pandora's box out of which the trouble arose was recommendation No. 9, that "the transportation of persons from one State to another State or Territory for the purpose of prostitution should be forbidden under heavy penalty." That recommendation, like recommendation No. 10, omits all mention of aliens and, I suppose, led to the opinion that, having finished the reformation of all the balance of the world, it was intended to commence cleaning out our own premises, but I have no idea such was the intention of the commission.

I believe recommendations 9 and 10 were intended to secure provisions ancillary to the immigration laws, and while not so specified were intended to refer to such laws as would help the Immigration Bureau to protect aliens and enforce the immigration law. Bills were introduced looking to the improvement of the immigration laws. The alert chairman of our great committee, complying with the admonition of St. Paul, "Magnify thy office," saw in that recommendation about transportation from one State to another a very large turn of grist which he thought ought to be turned into our mill, and he proceeded to introduce a bill which would show the Immigration Committee a great many things about that kind of legislation, and it looked like he was going to take all the glory away from the celebrated Committee on Immigration and Naturalization which had been so efficient, but the chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization knew a thing or two himself, and he gathered his committee together and they made the Howell bill and put in it all that stuff about interstate commerce and had it reported to the House in quick order, and, although our committee followed suit as rapidly as possible with a bill, if possible, much more obnoxious to the Constitution, it was a close race, and the chairman of the Immigration Committee secured the first call on calendar Wednesday, thereby refuting the before-mentioned error, that it was created for our committee alone. Then the battle of giants raged fast and furious.

According to the distinguished chairman of our committee the Howell bill was utterly unconstitutional and bad in every particular. I have no disposition to dispute it, but the advocates of that kind of legislation generally voted for the Howell bill and it passed this House. The next calendar Wednesday the other champion got on the boards. Then it was the time for the chairman of the Immigration Committee to entertain a poor opinion of the pending bill. I can not say that he was as certain of its unconstitutionality as our chairman was of the Howell bill's unconstitutionality, but entertaining, as I do, the settled opinion that both are unconstitutional, unnecessary, and foolish, it is strange to me that the advocates of that kind of legislation are so doubtful of their ground that they must go on passing the same kind of bills. If the Howell bill was good, why duplicate it on the statute books? If the pending bill was good, why rush the Howell bill through? If either one is good, why pile both of them on the statute books? If each chairman thinks the other bill unconstitutional, and yet both chairmen support both bills, I am forced to conclude that both are right in their opinions of unconstitutionality and that both are wrong in their conduct in supporting the legislation. [Applause.]

It will be observed that no attempt is made in either bill to prevent or punish the act of prostitution. It will be observed that immorality in transit, on the cars or other vehicles, is not prohibited at all. If the bill is constitutional, that provision would have been constitutional. It may be observed that only buying a ticket for a woman who is going to another State for prostitution is prohibited. There is no attempt to prohibit a vile man from buying a ticket to be used by himself or another vile man for transportation into another State for the purposes of immorality. If there is any sense in that part of the bill, these provisions ought to be included, but the chief points to be noticed are these: First, these provisions are liable to furnish boundless opportunity to hold up and blackmail and make unnecessary trouble, without any corresponding benefits to society. Second, you can not convict a man for buying a ticket unless you prove the purpose. The only way you can prove the purpose is to follow the woman and prove the prostitution. If you can prove the prostitution, you can accomplish your purpose under state laws. Oh, they say, but a State can not pass and enforce a law to prohibit a man from buying a ticket to send a woman into another State for an immoral purpose. In the first place, it is unnecessary to pass such a law.

In the second place, if it is morally wrong to buy that ticket, a State, in the exercise of its police power, can pass and enforce a law. If it be not wrong, no jurisdiction can prohibit it. In the third place, it is strange that this country has gotten along for a century and a quarter and the balance of the world for six thousand years without the necessity or discovery on the part of moral people that that had to be done, and only the American Congress could do it.

There have been only two parallel instances of legislation cited to support the contention in this case, and they are both unfortunate. The quarantine law, under which the Government protects the people through which the interstate commerce passes by preventing contact with persons or property infected with contagious diseases. The Government has a right to see that these persons and commodities are carried through the States and communities in interstate commerce, but it has recognized its duty to see that if any of them are infected by contagion they should be carried under such restriction and safeguards as to prevent that infection being communicated to any of the communities through which they pass.

Then, there is the case of lottery tickets, which in their essence and character are intended and used, sold, and purchased for no purpose on earth but the immoral practice of gambling. As vice, crime, and disease are not the subjects of commerce, but are things to be entirely suppressed, it was very properly provided and upheld by the courts that lottery tickets, per se iniquitous, should not have the privileges of interstate commerce, and that persons and commodities actually infected and in condition to communicate infection should not be allowed to come into contact with communities through which they pass. Now, the present proposition is that a general ticket unlimited to the use of any person shall be tabooed and the man shall be imprisoned for buying it if it is to be used by a woman to go into another State for the purpose of prostitution.

Now, in order to be parallel with either of the cases cited, in order for the proponents of this legislation to find in either of these cases a single leg to stand on, much less a case going "on all fours," they must show either, as in the quarantine case, that the woman's condition of vileness and immorality is contagious by contact, and that by using the ticket in paying for transportation on the train there is danger of contagion and contamination to the other persons and things being transported, or they must show, in order to parallel the case of the lottery ticket, the horrible falsehood that women are creatures per se vile and immoral, designed and intended in nature for no other than immoral purposes.

The argument goes inevitably to the reductio ad absurdum, and by inference and implication involves gross and wicked injustice to the sweet and lovely partners of our joys and sorrows, "Heaven's last, best gift to man," who sweeten and comfort our lives like veritable angels of love and mercy, which all good women really are, and impart to our existence here all that we enjoy of happiness and good and hope and foretaste of heaven. [Applause.]

There was some effort made to commit my colleague from Alabama, the refined and amiable Judge RICHARDSON, because he had erroneously supported some features of the pure-food legislation, but the attempt to analogize anything in that legislation to the unconstitutional features of this bill is so farfetched as to need no refutation here. Furthermore, that reference can not estop me, because I enjoy the proud distinction of having fought the drastic and illegal features in that bill until we secured the elimination of most of them and the modification of all the others.

I dislike the necessity of having to oppose unwise legislation which is erroneously supposed by people to be in the interest of morality, but I have more faith in the ability and disposition of the people to protect morals through the different state governments than in their accomplishing it through one centralized Federal Government. The States are equipped for that purpose. The work is distributed among them. That is the proper way and the best way to uphold morals. The Constitution provides that it is the only way. The Supreme Court says it is the only way.

I would have refrained from saying so much, but enjoying membership on the committee which considered this bill, I was compelled either to support or oppose it; and being constrained by my oath of office and my regard for morality and good government to oppose it, I felt it was due to my fellow-Members, to my constituents, and to the country to explain to them the reasons why I have opposed the legislation.

I thank the House for its patient and kind attention. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning on page 5, line 20, at the words "every person," all down to and including the word "otherwise," on page 7.

[Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I am very thankful to the gentleman from Illinois for the time he yields to me, and I do not want now to say anything that will detract from the eloquence of the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I gave notice of a purpose to offer an amendment to this bill, but that notice is now recalled, because the gentleman from Georgia has offered the amendment that I intended to make, to wit, to strike out certain portions of the bill in section 6, those portions making it a crime for any person keeping a house of ill fame to fail to report that he entertains in his house an alien women—alien and not in this country beyond three years. The provision proposes to make that a crime; not the matter of keeping a house of ill fame a crime, not to make it a crime to permit illicit intercourse in the keeper's house, but the fact only that he did not report those things, and particularly that a once alien woman was kept in his house, that they may be made public. There is another criticism of the latter clause of this portion of this bill that is proposed to be stricken out, and I only refer to it as a minor matter; but it would be intolerable in a criminal law. The clause referred to undertakes to provide that a certain thing shall be presumptive of guilt and to throw upon the accused the onus or burden and the responsibility of proving his innocence; otherwise he must be convicted. I believe that is the first time we have ever seen such a provision in a criminal statute.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] the other day admitted that the provision of the bill sought to be struck out, if enacted into law, would be unconstitutional unless it was authorized by a treaty between the United States and certain foreign countries. He admitted it could not be upheld under the interstate and foreign commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Now, if he had looked at the treaty, he would have found not a word in it that authorized or justified anything in relation to criminal legislation. There is not a word in it that demands in the execution of the treaty any legislation of this character.

Omitting only the formal parts, I submit the treaty referred to.

The terms of the agreement are as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Each of the contracting Governments agrees to establish or designate an authority who will be directed to centralize all information concerning the procuration of women or girls both in a view to their debauchery in a foreign country; that authority shall have the right to correspond directly with the similar service established in each of the other contracting States.

ART. 2. Each of the Governments agrees to exercise a supervision for the purpose to find out, particularly in the stations, harbors of embarkation, and on the journey, the conductors of women or girls intended for debauchery. Instructions shall be sent for that purpose to the officials or to any other qualified persons, in order to procure, within the limits of the laws, all information of a nature to discover a criminal traffic.

The arrival of persons appearing evidently to be the authors, the accomplices, or the victims of such a traffic will be notified, in each case, either to the authorities of the place of destination or to the interested diplomatic or consular agents, or to any other competent authorities.

ART. 3. The Governments agree to receive in each case, within the limits of the laws, the declarations of women and girls of foreign nationality who surrender themselves to prostitution, with a view to establish their identity and their civil status and to ascertain who has induced them to leave their country. The information received will be communicated to the authorities of the country of origin of the said women or girls, with a view to their eventual return.

The Governments agree, within the limits of the laws and as far as possible, to confide, temporarily and with a view to their eventual return, the victims of criminal traffic, when they are without any resources, to some institutions of public or private charity or to private individuals furnishing the necessary guaranties.

The Governments agree also, within the limits of the laws, to return to their country of origin those women or girls who ask their return or who may be claimed by persons having authority over them. Return will be made only after reaching an understanding as to their identity and nationality, as well as to the place and date of their arrival at the frontiers. Each of the contracting parties will facilitate the transit on his territory.

The correspondence relative to the return will be made, as far as possible, through the direct channel.

ART. 4. In case the woman or girl to be sent back can not pay herself the expenses of her transportation and she has neither husband nor relations nor guardian to pay for her the expenses occasioned by her return, they shall be borne by the country or the territory of which she resides as far as the nearest frontier or port of embarkation in the direction of the country of origin, and by the country of origin for the remainder.

ART. 5. The provisions of the above articles 3 and 4 shall not infringe upon the provisions of special conventions which may exist between the contracting Governments.

ART. 6. The contracting Governments agree, within the limits of the laws, to exercise, as far as possible, a supervision over the bureaus or agencies which occupy themselves with finding places for women or girls in foreign countries.

Articles 7, 8, and 9 provide for the adhesion of the nonsignatory states, that the arrangement shall take effect six months after the date of the exchange of the ratifications, and for the formalities attending the ratification and exchange of the agreement, respectively. It was called only a "project of arrangement," and bears date at Paris, France, May 18, 1904—by Germany, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, France, Great Britain, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Russia, Sweden, Norway, and the Swiss Federal Council.

The objects and purposes sought were highly commendable.

If it were full, though, from top to bottom of provisions that the Congress of the United States should pass laws of the character that is proposed here, those laws would still be unconstitutional, for, from the beginning of the Government to the present, whenever the question has arisen, it has been held that no treaty, however solemnly made and ratified, could give direction to the Congress of the United States to make laws that were in violation of the Constitution. So my friend from Texas, when he admits that this proposed law would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, admits it will be void; and, of course, it can not be justified, even though the treaty stipulated we could make such laws.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman may possibly have misunderstood me. I say that this section 6 can not be justified, and is not attempted to be justified, under the commerce laws of the Constitution.

Mr. KEIFER. Under that provision, of course not. Making reports about who are inmates of bawdy houses is not interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. RUSSELL. But that it rests on the treaty-making power, and upon that I think power is ample.

Mr. KEIFER. It rests upon the treaty-making power, if on any power, but I understood the gentleman to say that we had a treaty with these nations authorizing the proposed criminal legislation, and I venture to state to the gentleman that if he will look at the treaty he will not find a syllable in it that tends to show that we should make any law of any kind, let alone such as the one proposed by the clause sought to be struck out.

It was decided long ago. I could go into numerous cases, and will not, but will read one or two authorities. I read from the fifth volume of Moore's Digest of International Law, page 166:

That a treaty is no more the supreme law of the land than is an act of Congress is shown by the fact that an act of Congress vacates pro tanto a prior inconsistent treaty. Whenever, therefore, an act of Congress would be unconstitutional as invading the reserved rights of the States, a treaty to the same effect would be unconstitutional. The treaty-making power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments and those arising from the nature of the Government and that of the State. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government, or in that of one of the States, or the cession of a portion of the territory of the latter without its consent.

I need not pursue the subject. Long ago, in 19 Howard, in the case of Prevost v. The Treasurer of the State of Louisiana, Chief Justice Taney laid down this same principle, and as far as I have been able to trace it, it is found all along the line, so that unless the Constitution permits us to legislate in this way the provision referred to would be unconstitutional, no matter what is contained in the articles of treaty that are referred to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are fallen upon strange times. In our anxiety to legislate against certain evils we ignore the Constitution of the United States. In our anxiety perhaps to legislate or offer to legislate in answer to a general popular cry we fail to pay attention to the Constitution of the United States. In our actions here we forget the oaths that we take to support the Constitution of the United States when we enter upon the duties of our offices. Popular cry is regarded as sufficient to be raised against a Member to keep him quiet in his place, although it is proposed to violate the plain provisions of the Constitution. We are invading the Constitution every day, and leaving it to the Supreme Court of the United States to stand as the great bulwark against this continuing, growing evil. There is a time to stop and consider whether we are not in effect or in fact perjuring ourselves in passing such measures as this, with such provisions contained in them. I believe in Congress holding on to all its grants of federal power, but I am opposed to its attempting to usurp powers exclusively granted or reserved to the States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask unanimous consent for ten minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. I am thankful to the House. I am not going to oppose the bill in its general purposes, for I understand that we have certain rights in reference to regulating the introduction of aliens of immoral character into this country, but we and Congress can by law regulate them for the District of Columbia and the Territories, but not because of any provision can not do it under the police power of the Government. That has been settled long ago, The matter of immoral practices may be regulated by police regulations by a State for itself, in the Constitution authorizing us to regulate commerce between the States and foreign governments.

I turn, now, to the report of the committee for the purpose of calling attention to the case of Keller against the United States (213 U. S.), and I find, on page 19 of the committee's report, a sufficient part of the opinion in that case to answer all the purposes which I desire to consider. I read:

Undoubtedly, as held, "Congress has the power to exclude aliens from the United States; to prescribe the terms and conditions on which they may come in; to establish regulations for sending out of the country such aliens as have entered in violation of law, and to commit the enforcement of such conditions and regulations to executive officers."

Now, going to page 20 of the report, the court say:

While the keeping of a house of ill fame is offensive to the moral sense, yet that fact must not close the eye to the question whether the power to punish therefor is delegated to Congress or is reserved to the State. Jurisdiction over such an offense comes within the accepted definition of the police power.

Quoting from the case of Patterson v. Kentucky (97 U. S., 501), from which I will read:

In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and can not be assumed by the National Government. (Cooley, Const. Lim., 574.)

Now a single other paragraph on the point I have already referred to. That is the caution against allowing subjects of this kind to deflect us from our duty as Members of Congress. The court say:

That there is a moral consideration in the special facts of this case—

That is, a case involving illicit relations—

is immaterial, for, as stated, there is in the Constitution no grant to Congress of the police power, and the legislation must stand or fall according to the determination of the question of the power of Congress to control generally dealings of citizens with aliens.

In the clause that I seek to have stricken from this bill we have passed away from the power to regulate these people as aliens when, after they have been admitted and have become citizens and lived in the country a period not exceeding three years, we require one of our own citizens to make a report in relation to them if found in a house of ill fame that he is in control of, and that citizen, not the alien, to be regulated, but that citizen is to be subjected to punishment as a criminal for not making a report relating to the alien woman showing where she is to be found. The keeper, under this clause, is not to be punished for keeping a house of ill fame or for harboring a lewd alien by birth if she has not been in the United States to exceed a year. Such legislation clearly belongs to the States. It has no tendency to regulate the admission or exclusion of aliens, whatever their character may be, and the making of such report is in no sense interstate or foreign commerce, and no treaty does or can make such a law constitutional.

Now we come to the question who shall do this. The States. Some people say that the power of the State may be ample, but if they fail, the General Government should come in and do that which the State ought to do. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is more safety in leaving the powers that are given or reserved by the Constitution of the United States to the States, leaving them there, and if the legislature of the States do not pass ample laws, or pass bad laws, they are nearer the people, and the people can correct the wrong whenever they choose. [Applause.] It is much easier, much cheaper, and much safer to trust the people in the States to, through their legislative bodies, make wholesome and wise laws for themselves and to regulate morals than it is to rely on Congress with all its multifarious duties.

We have here in this great legislative body too many things to deal with to allow us, if our Constitution permitted, to reach out and grasp for power that is given to the States. Even though not exclusively given to the States, it is wise often to allow the States to exercise the power that may be constitutionally exercised by the Federal Government.

I only make these remarks, without any special previous preparation, simply to enter my protest, not against the purpose of the legislation proposed, but against the power or the right or the duty of the Congress of the United States to be engaged in passing up bills to the courts of the country to denounce as unconstitutional.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] talks eloquently about the Magna Charta that was wrung from King John on the meadows of Runnymede, but that charter does not have any such effect as our written Constitution. It is unwritten, and when it comes to dealing with questions in the Parliament of England they may pass any law they please regardless of Magna Charta. Their courts do not exercise the power of declaring laws passed by the Parliament of England as in violation of Magna Charta. They have gone a good ways, they think, when they hold a law to be void because it is against public policy or public morals. But you do not find any decision declaring a law of Parliament unconstitutional because it violates that great charter of which my friend from Georgia speaks so eloquently.

But here we can pass bills, constitutional and unconstitutional, and they go, as in the employer's liability bill, at great expense of litigants, to the courts, to be stricken down there. I think it behooves us to look carefully at every measure and see whether or not it is constitutional. It may be answered that if the provision we are seeking to strike out of the bill is found to be unconstitutional, the whole bill may not be, but it ought not to be in the law to invite litigation. I know that the courts have held in latter years that a provision in the act of a state legislature or an act of Congress that is unconstitutional does not necessarily make the whole act unconstitutional; that it did not do so unless it appeared from the whole text of the bill that the unconstitutional provision was one of the principal elements or purposes which led to the passage of the act. [Applause.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, the considerations which prompt the support of this bill are so widespread and its objects are so well understood and meet with such universal approval that no explanation or repetition of them need be made to this House.

The bill aims to aid in the suppression of the white-slave traffic by making it a felony to purchase interstate transportation for any woman going to a place for purposes of prostitution. The act, in section 6, also compels all keepers of disorderly houses who have in them alien women of less than three years' residence in this country to file a report of such women with the Commissioner-General of Immigration.

The traffic which this bill seeks to suppress has reached such proportions that an international conference has been held for its consideration, and its conditions and extent in this country have been called to public attention by the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration, both for the years 1907 and 1908, and by the recommendations of the Immigration Commission of December 10, 1909.

To none more than to my colleagues who have spoken against this bill do its humanitarian objects, I am certain, appeal. Their opposition to the bill, we all appreciate, is based on their views of its constitutionality, and in no way indicates a lack of sympathy with its objects.

Differing from these gentlemen, however, as I do, I wish to present the views upon which I believe the bill should be supported. There can be no question as to our duty in regard to a measure of which the constitutionality is in question. The doctrine that, because the objects of a bill meet with our approval, we should support it, irrespective of our views on its constitutionality, and rely on the courts to determine later that question, I decline to submit to. The responsibility for the constitutionality of a measure is ours, and we must not avoid it. We take an oath of office to support the Constitution, and a vote for a bill we believe unconstitutional would be a violation of that oath.

I support this bill because I believe it is constitutional, and I ask the attention of the House to the grounds on which that opinion is based and the decisions of our Supreme Court upon which the majority of the committee base their views. The commerce clause of the Constitution gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and it is believed this bill falls within the powers so conferred.

POWER OF CONGRESS OVER COMMERCE.

The powers of Congress over commerce between the States and the powers of the individual States over such commerce have been subject to frequent adjudications by our courts, which have laid down certain principles upon which the cases have been decided. The Supreme Court in its decisions has divided the subject into three classes: First, those cases in which the power of the State is exclusive; second, cases in which the States may act in the absence of legislation by Congress; third, cases in which the action of Congress is exclusive and the States can not interfere at all.

The first class includes all those cases in which the States have absolute power, which concern the strictly internal commerce of the State, and in which Congress has no power. While the regulations of the State under this power may affect interstate commerce, their bearing upon it is so remote that it can not be termed in any just sense an "interference." The States may authorize under this power the construction of highways or railways between points in the same State, or such means of communication as do not form a continuous highway over which commerce is, or may be, carried on with other States or foreign countries. This power gives authority for the general police regulations of the States.

The second class of cases, which includes those of concurrent jurisdiction, embraces the policing of harbors and regulating of wharves, and in this the States may legislate in the absence of congressional legislation.

The third class of cases is that where the laws, instead of affecting interstate commerce but incidentally, affect it vitally, and thus are national in their character. Over this class the jurisdiction of Congress is exclusive.

TRANSIT OF INDIVIDUALS IS COMMERCE.

It is within the latter class of decisions that this case comes. The proposition that the transit of individuals from State to State is in itself commerce, and as such is subject to regulation, is based on decisions of which the soundness can not be questioned.

In Gloucester Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania (114 U. S., 196) the case was one between a ferry company whose entire business was in transporting passengers between Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The State of Pennsylvania passed an act which imposed a tax upon that company. The court said they could not tax the property of the company engaged generally in its business, or the business of the company itself, but only the property which it owned within the State of Pennsylvania. The court said in part (p. 203):

> Congress alone, therefore, can deal with such transportation; its non-action is a declaration that it shall remain free from burdens imposed by state legislation. Otherwise there would be no protection against conflicting regulations of different States, each legislating in favor of its own citizens and products and against those of other States.

Following out this decision we have the case of Bowman v. Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company (125 U. S., 465), in which case the legislature of the State of Iowa sought by statutory provision to prohibit the importation of liquor within that State. The court in holding such an act to be unconstitutional said (p. 481):

> It is of national importance that over that subject there should be but one regulating power, for if one State can directly tax persons or property passing through it, or tax them indirectly by levying a tax upon their transportation, every other may, and thus commercial intercourse between States remote from each other may be destroyed.

Carrying out this same line of decision in the case of Cooley v. Port Wardens (12 How., 299), with which so many of you are familiar, in referring to various States where they have laws relative to pilotage, the court said (p. 319):

> Now, the power to regulate commerce embraces a vast field, containing not only many but exceedingly varied subjects, quite unlike in their nature, some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule, operating equally in the commerce of the United States in every port.

Expanding this idea in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691), the court said (p. 697):

> The subjects, indeed, upon which Congress can act under this power are of infinite variety, requiring for their successful management different plans or modes of treatment. Some of them are national in their character and demand and require uniformity of regulation affecting alike all the States. Others are local, or mere aids to commerce, and can only be properly regulated by provisions adapted to their special circumstances and localities.

Again the court says, later on in the same case (p. 702):

Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. For the regulation of commerce as thus defined there can be only one system of rules, applicable alike to the whole country; and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Action upon it by separate States is not therefore permissible.

The case of In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545) raised the question of the constitutionality of an act which provided that all liquids transported into any State or Territory for consumption or sale should, upon their arrival, be subject to the local laws. In this instance the petitioner was arrested for breach of those laws. The court said, in referring to the act (p. 561):

Congress has not attempted to delegate the power to regulate commerce or to exercise any power reserved to the States or to grant a power not possessed by the States or to adopt state laws. It has taken its own course and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in state laws in dealing with such property.

Mr. Speaker, this line of cases shows that the transit of persons between two States is distinctly under the powers given to Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Following these decisions comes the case of Covington Bridge Company v. Kentucky (154 U. S., 204). In this case the bridge company erected a bridge between Kentucky and Ohio. The legislature of Kentucky passed a law regulating traffic over that bridge. The case went to the United States Supreme Court, and the court said, in part, commenting upon it (p. 218):

With reference to the second count, an attempt is made to distinguish a bridge from a ferryboat and to argue that while the latter is an instrument of interstate commerce the former is not. Both are, however, vehicles of such commerce, and the fact that one is movable and the other is a fixture makes no difference in the application of the rule. Commerce was defined in Gibbons v. Ogden to be intercourse, and the thousands of people who daily pass and repass over this bridge may be correctly said to be engaged in commerce as if they were shipping cargoes of merchandise from New York to Liverpool. While the bridge company is not itself a common carrier, it affords a highway for such carriage, and a toll upon such bridge is as much a tax upon commerce as a toll upon a turnpike is a tax upon the traffic of such turnpike or the charges upon a ferry a tax upon the commerce across a river. A tax laid upon those who do the business of common carriers upon a certain bridge is as much a tax upon the commerce of that bridge as if the owner of the bridge were himself a common carrier.

And with that statement the court declared unconstitutional the act of the State seeking to affect this commerce over the bridge.

We have shown in the previous decisions I have just read that this transportation of persons is commerce, and now I shall read you some cases which will show that it is a form of commerce which comes under the class of cases in which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction and for the regulating of which Congress has already established a precedent. I will read a part of the decision in the Lottery cases. The Lottery cases (188 U. S., 321) declared constitutional certain statutes making it a crime to transport lottery tickets from one State to another in the United States. In these Lottery cases the court said (p. 357):

As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the "widespread pestilence of lotteries" and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets, as carried on through interstate commerce, Congress only supplemented the action of those States—perhaps all of them—which, for the protection of the public morals, prohibit the drawing of lotteries, as well as the sale or circulation of lottery tickets, within their respective limits. It said, in effect, that it would not permit the declared policy of the States, which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business, to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce. We should hesitate long before adjudging that an evil of such appalling character, carried on through interstate commerce, can not be met and crushed by the only power competent to that end. We say competent to that end, because Congress alone has the power to occupy, by legislation, the whole field of interstate commerce. What was said by this court upon a former occasion may well be here repeated: "The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject-matter specifically committed to its charge."

The decision in this case, which has never been overruled, states the law as it is to-day, and it is in no small part on the basis of this decision that support of our bill rests.

The circumstances for which we seek to legislate would seem to call for the application of the same broad principles here enunciated, and that those principles, applied to our case, would support its constitutionality can admit of little doubt.

A most recent decision, and one which drew to it, on account of the magnitude of the issues involved, widespread attention, also uses language which may appeal to us as being applicable to this legislation. I am referring to the Northern Securities case (Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S., 197). Here it was held that a certain arrangement was an illegal combination in restraint of interstate commerce. The court there said (p. 341):

They (referring to certain cases cited) serve also to give point to the declaration of this court in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 197)—a principle never modified by any subsequent decision—that, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of the powers granted by that instrument, "the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of power as are found in the Constitution of the United States." Is there, then, any escape from the conclusion that, subject only to such restrictions, the power of Congress over interstate and international commerce is as full and complete as is the power of any State over its domestic commerce? If a State may strike down combinations that restrain its domestic commerce by destroying free competition among those engaged in such commerce, what power, except that of Congress, is competent to protect the freedom of interstate and international commerce when assailed by a combination that restrains such commerce by stifling competition among those engaged in it?

These two last cases, the Lottery case and the Northern Securities case, show the principles on the application of which the Supreme Court would decide this statute, should it ever come before it, and support the soundness of the contention of the majority of the committee, which claims this measure to be constitutional.

LACK OF IMMUNITY CLAUSE NO OBJECTION TO REPEAL.

Section 6 of the bill, to which objection has been made so strenuously, provides that the Commissioner of Immigration collect information for the purpose of regulating and preventing the transportation in foreign commerce of alien women and girls for immoral purposes. A person who harbors any such woman or girl for immoral purposes, within three years after she enters the United States, is required to file a statement as to her nationality, age, and certain other information.

The principal objection to this clause is that no immunity is provided for the person who makes the statement. So far as this objection applies to the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the jurisdiction directly under Congress, the objection is sound, but is met by an amendment which will be offered by the chairman of our committee, which provides such immunity. In the general situation, without considering the District of Columbia and Territories, this objection is not sound. There is no law of the United States which makes the keeping of a house of prostitution itself a crime. Therefore the statement required does not subject the person making it to any prosecution under the jurisdiction to which the admission is made. I will read to you from the decision of Hale v. Henkle (201 U. S., 43), which supports the contention that it is proper and constitutional to require a statement such as is provided by section 6 of this bill (p. 287):

The object of the amendment—

Which provides that a person shall not be obliged to incriminate himself—

is to establish in express language and upon a firm basis the general principle of English and American jurisprudence, that no one shall be compelled to give testimony which may expose him to prosecution for crime. It is not declared that he may not be compelled to testify to facts which may impair his reputation for probity, or even tend to disgrace him, but the line is drawn at testimony that may expose him to prosecution. If the testimony relate to criminal acts long since past, and against the prosecution of which the statute of limitations has run, or for which he has already received a pardon or is guaranteed an immunity, the amendment does not apply.

The interdiction of the fifth amendment operates only where a witness is asked to incriminate himself—in other words, to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge. But if the criminality has already been taken away, the amendment ceases to apply. The criminality provided against is a present not a past criminality, which lingers only as a memory and involves no present danger of prosecution. To put an extreme case, a man in his boyhood or youth may have committed acts which the law pronounces criminal, but it would never be asserted that he would thereby be made a criminal for life.

Wigmore on Evidence, volume 4, section 2258, says:

It is not in the power or duty of one State, or of its courts, to be concerned in the criminal law of another State. For the former there is but one law, and that is its own. The boundaries of our Constitution and our sovereignty are coextensive. A constitution is intended to protect the accused against the methods of its own jurisdiction, and no other. The court's view, as well as its functions, should be confined to its own organic sphere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PETERS. I thank the gentleman from Illinois.

So far as the provisions of this section as amended are concerned they conform to the constitutional view of the decisions. The object of this section 6 is to carry out the terms of an agreement entered into between 12 European nations to protect women against the criminal traffic known as "Traite des blanches," and to which the United States was invited to subscribe. This compact was signed in Paris May 18, 1904, ratified by the Senate, and proclaimed by the President June 15, 1908. The white-slave traffic reached such proportions that a convention of European countries was called on the subject, and as a result the above agreement was made. The various countries adhering to the agreement were to make statements as to where women and girls of this class came from and such countries were to return to their home country any of those unfortunates who were found in any of the signatories which come under the provisions of this act. Section 6 contains the requirements of this agreement and is inserted in the bill to give the United States power to effectually carry out the terms of the agreement referred to. It is our duty to give the Government the power to carry out the provisions of this agreement. I will read from Moore on International Law, volume 5, section 222, as follows:

A treaty * * * when dependent on legislative action does not take effect until such action is had.

Where a treaty can not be executed without the aid of an act of Congress, it is the duty of Congress to enact such laws.

My time has nearly expired, and I wish to sum up briefly the position which we have taken. You must all approve of efforts to regulate and suppress the form of commerce this bill proposes. It would be obviously unconstitutional for any State to attempt to enact a law to affect such commerce or make the purchase of a ticket in one State to be used in interstate transportation constitute a crime. To Congress, therefore, must we look for aid. The cases cited show that the transit of individuals from State to State is interstate commerce, that the proposed regulation is a matter directly connected with interstate commerce and comes under that class of matters of which the regulation is intrusted alone to Congress, and support the contention that this measure is constitutional. This measure, then, in place of being a blow to the rights of the States as to their own government, is an aid and support to the States, and its enactment will enable them to carry out better and more effectively for their own people laws for their protection. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has a most meritorious purpose, and rests upon the well-established power of Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

This power is now called into exercise, in an effort to break up a villainous interstate, and international traffic in innocent girls, and women, who are in many cases induced to leave home under specious promises of steady employment at remunerative wages, only to find themselves in the result, deprived of their liberties, and compelled to lead vicious and immoral lives, under conditions of restraint, and compulsion, which have been aptly, and universally styled, "white slavery."

This "white-slave trade" has attained such extensive, and alarming proportions, that it has been made the subject of an international agreement between Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, and many other foreign powers. The United States became a signatory to this agreement in 1908, and by this bill we undertake to afford an efficacious protection against this criminal traffic, to those who would otherwise be its victims.

The mere fact that such a traffic exists in any proportions, is a blot on modern civilization, but the extent to which our supineness has allowed it to proceed, is the crowning disgrace of the twentieth century. Governmental investigations recently conducted on our part, disclose the startling fact that the importation of foreign girls, and women, and the transfer of native girls between the States, has been systematic, and continuous.

The testimony which has been collected, including correspondence and other documentary evidence, which was captured at the time of arrest of certain notorious criminals, clearly reveals that an organized society exists both in this country, and abroad, formed for no other purpose than to exploit innocent girls for immoral purposes. This syndicate has headquarters, and distributing centers, in New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Denver, and many other American cities, extending even as far north, as Nome in Alaska. From the data accumulated by the government agents, it appears that within the last ten years, hundreds of girls have been transferred to various portions of the United States, through the pernicious activities of the agents of this syndicate. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, refers to this unholy business on page 18 of his report for 1908, in the following terms:

It is highly necessary that this diabolical traffic which has attained international proportions, should be dealt with in a manner adequate to compass its suppression. No punishment is too severe to be inflicted upon the procurers in this vile traffic.

In 1907, Congress created an immigration commission, which has conducted a searching inquiry into the operations of this syndicate. In February 1909, this commission submitted a preliminary report. From this report, I extract the following striking statement:

The commission has made an extensive investigation into the question of importing, and harboring women for immoral purposes. The results show that many women are being transported under conditions which amount to absolute slavery.

The evidence taken by the Government further shows, that many victims of this traffic, have been coerced into leading lives of shame, by the use of force, deceit, fraud, and every variety of trickery. In many instances they are most unwilling victims, who are literally compelled to practice immorality, and are held to its pursuit, by means of violence, and restraint.

"They are practically slaves, in the true sense of the word, and when necessary, force is used to deprive them of their liberty." Well may we ask:

Can such things be,
And is civilization a failure?

The following language is found in the report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is filed with this bill:

The term "white slave," includes those women, and girls, who are literally slaves—those women who are owned, and held as property, and chattels—whose lives, are lives of involuntary servitude, and who, in too many instances, are sold outright. The victims of the "white-slave traffic," are the women, and girls who, if given a fair chance, would, in all human probability, have been good wives, and mothers, and useful citizens.

It is further developed by the Government investigations that, in many cases involving the transportation of native, and foreign girls, in interstate traffic, the active agents in this infamous enterprise, use every means, and device known to the criminal classes, to accomplish their purpose.

So much for the evil. Now for the remedy. Congress does not undertake to deal with this question in the exercise of any supposed police power, nor does it in any sense, propose to displace the police power of the States in the intrastate suppression, or regulation, of any manifestation of voluntary, or involuntary immorality, which falls within that power, and with which, the States are therefore competent to deal. But this bill does propose to penalize the improper use of the common carriers for transporting innocent girls designed for immoral purposes, from the country districts across state lines, to the centers of population, and from foreign countries, into this country.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who oppose this measure, allege that it is an unconstitutional interference with the police power of the States.

This suggestion of unconstitutionality ought to be settled in limine. For if the objects which this bill seeks to accomplish, are not within the scope, and exercise of our constitutional authority, no amount of meritorious purpose, will afford a sufficient reason for its enactment. But the friends of the measure ought not to beat a hasty retreat, or strike their flag, at the first suggestion of unconstitutionality. No splitting of hairs in verbal dialectics, or subtle distinctions carried to the last refinement of analysis, should be sufficient to induce us to abandon a measure which we are impelled to enact, by every consideration of morality, and every call of decency.

In my judgment this bill is clearly constitutional, and it is to the constitutional questions which are involved, that I wish to direct the attention of the House. It is intimated by the opponents of the bill, that the popular demand for its passage is so compelling, and overwhelming, that in their anxiety to conform to the popular wish, the Members who support this measure, have disregarded, and overlooked, the serious questions of constitutional law which are presented in this connection. This I deny, on the part of the friends of the bill. Speaking for myself, I intend to meet as squarely, and as fairly as I can, every constitutional objection that has been presented in this debate. The second section of the bill which has been the chief target of attack, provides in substance: That any person who shall knowingly transport, or cause to be transported, or aid, or assist in obtaining transportation for, or in transporting, in interstate, or foreign commerce, or in any Territory, or in the District of Columbia, any woman, or girl, for the purpose of prostitution and debauchery, and so forth, shall, on conviction, be punished as therein provided. Is there any Member of this House who claims that any individual, or collection of individuals, exists in this country, who are empowered to conduct a traffic of this sort, as a matter of right, and who are so far privileged, that they can set up constitutional immunity from interference? Are they so intrenched in the right to pursue this infamous, and nefarious business, that they can defy us to dislodge them, or to restrain them from its continued prosecution, even by the supremest exercise of federal authority?

If that be true, it comes with a shock of great surprise to most of us.

What is this interstate traffic, over which we exercise control? It is admitted here by the gentlemen who have argued in opposition to this bill, that the transportation of insensate objects for a consideration, from one State to another, is clearly commerce; and yet when it is proposed to carry from State to State, sentient beings for the purposes of degradation, and dishonor, and in order that the image in which they have been created, shall be defaced, these gentlemen seek to make a distinction, and assert that this transport across state lines of living beings for immoral purposes, is not commerce, and can not be reached under authority of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

Why, of course, Mr. Speaker, this is commerce. Intercourse is commerce. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat.)

The transmission of intelligence is commerce. (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S.; Pensacola Telegraph Co., 96 U. S.; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S., 640.)

Transportation of property for hire, is certainly interstate commerce. If transit of persons from foreign countries, to our country, is commerce, then inevitably the transit of persons from State to State, is commerce. (Pittsburg Coal Co., 156 U. S., p. 587.) The transit of persons from foreign countries into this country, is commerce, and subject to the regulation, and control of Congress. (Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 152 U. S., p. 651, and the cases therein cited.) The passage of foot passengers from one side of the Ohio River, to the other, is commerce. (Covington Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S., pp. 204, 218.)

Commerce between the States embraces navigation, intercourse, communication, traffic, the transit of persons, and the transmission of messages by telegraph. (Lottery case, 188 U. S., p. 352.)

The power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely, as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution, the same restrictions on the exercise of the power, as are found in the Constitution of the United States. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton.)

The power to regulate commerce between the States, is as complete, as the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. (Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S., pp. 630, 682.)

To the same effect as Brown v. Houston (see Coal Co. v. Botes, 156 U. S., pp. 577, 587).

In the Lottery case it was decided that lottery tickets were the subject of traffic among those who chose to buy, or sell them; that the carriage of such tickets by independent carriers from one State to another, was interstate commerce; that under its power to regulate commerce between the States, Congress, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the powers granted by it, had plenary authority over such commerce, and could prohibit the carriage of such tickets from State to State; and that legislation to that end, and of that character, was not inconsistent with any limitation, or restriction imposed by the Constitution upon the powers granted to Congress. (Lottery case, 188 U. S., p. 363.)

In apparent disregard of these cogent authorities, which maintain with accumulating force, that the transit of persons from State, to State, is commerce, the opponents of this bill aver with seeming confidence that Congress is destitute of power to deal with this subject-matter, and that our control over commerce, and its agencies, affords no authority to the Federal Government to aim an effective blow at this infamous, this infernal traffic. They assert that with the passage of this bill, we are preparing to invade the police power of the States. If so, will they indicate the extent, and direction of that invasion? What right is it that we propose to take from any State, which that State now enjoys under the police power? What is the authority of which we will deprive the States, should we enact this legislation? Wherein will we trench upon the police power of any State, should we prohibit this form of interstate commerce? How do the States propose to deal with that phase of this iniquitous business, which is related to, and carried on, through the agencies of interstate traffic? Our opponents say that Congress has nothing to do with questions of morality, and decency, in the enactment of its legislation, and that the control of morals is an exclusive function of the police power. This is too broad a statement.

I am free to admit that in the ordinary use of the term, the Government of the United States possesses no police power, but I utterly deny that in the enactment of its legislation, Congress should exclude from contemplation, all questions of morality, decent living, and civic betterment. The whole body of our penal legislation is measurably related to considerations of this character. But, say our adversaries, this bill is not regulation, it is prohibition. The right of regulation, carries with it, in a proper case, the right of prohibition, and the authority of Congress to exercise the latter right, is dependent upon the subject-matter, and the nature of the traffic. There are various instances in which Congress has exercised the right of prohibition, as a part of its control over commerce. One instance of this character, is in the case of obscene literature. The non-importation, and embargo laws, of the period prior to the war of 1812, also belong to this class. Still another illustration of the proposition that regulation may take the form of prohibition, is the Sherman Act. So also, is the pure-food act.

The lottery case arose under a statute closely resembling the one which it is proposed to enact. That statute provided, among other things, that anyone causing to be carried from one State to another, any paper, and so forth, purporting to be, or to represent, a ticket in a lottery should be punishable as provided.

The parties who were indicted and convicted under authority of this act, had arranged for the transportation by the Wells-Fargo Express Company, of certain lottery tickets from Texas, to California. In passing on the questions raised, the court announced that the carriage by independent carriers, of lottery tickets, from one State, to another, was interstate commerce, which Congress could prohibit under its power to regulate commerce between the several States:

> Legislation under that power, may sometimes, and properly, assume the form, or have the effect, of prohibition. Legislation prohibiting the carriage of such tickets, is not inconsistent with any limitation, or restriction, imposed upon the exercise of the powers granted to Congress. (Lottery Case, 188 U. S., p. 321.)

And now, just in this connection, I want to say that so long as the Lottery case stands, we need not concern ourselves over the other cases which our friends are so fond of citing, as controlling authority. Nearly every case that was relied on this morning, by our friend from Georgia, had been referred to, discussed, and dismissed from consideration, in the majority opinion of the Supreme Court, in the Lottery case.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Not all of them.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not all of them, but most of them. I recognized them as old, familiar friends, who are heard from whenever we seek to exercise the right of control over interstate commerce, in some effective way.

Again, I think it was another gentleman from Georgia, who asserted that the transportation of a lottery ticket, was interstate commerce, and could be prohibited, because the ticket itself, was immoral, was "iniquitous per se." How can printed pieces of paper be in themselves immoral? They possess no self-executing capacity for immorality, and it is only when they are related to some human agency, or form a part of some mischievous human scheme, that they become effective for purposes of evil.

But so soon as they assumed this relation, it was competent for Congress to furnish legislation that was adequate for the suppression of the traffic, in so far as it was conducted through interstate commerce. The Supreme Court decided in the Lottery case, that if the States could take into consideration the evils that inhered in the raising of money by lotteries, Congress, invested as it was with the power to regulate commerce between the States, could provide that the channels of this commerce should not be polluted by carrying lottery tickets from State, to State. This pronouncement would seem to be decisive of the contention, that Congress can not relate its enactments to moral considerations.

The pieces of printed paper that passed through these channels, were not a pollution per se, of these channels. They constituted a pollution only so far as they were related to a scheme which had come under the moral reprobation of the country. It was only by virtue of its control over interstate commerce, that Congress was enabled to deal with the question at all.

The impelling motive of the lottery legislation was a national purpose to stamp out the lottery evil. Then, as now, it was objected that Congress was trespassing on forbidden ground, and that the care of the Nation's morals, was not within its purview. The Supreme Court made short work of this contention:

> Just as a State for the purpose of guarding the morals of its people, may forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States, against the widespread pestilence of lotteries, and to protect the commerce which concerns all of the States, may prohibit the carriage of these tickets from State to State. (Lottery case, p. 357.)

Thus in effect, the court announced that the declared policy of the States, in seeking to protect their own people, should not be overthrown, or disregarded, by an improper use of the agencies commonly employed in interstate commerce.

It sometimes happens that the same general subject is approached by Congress, and by the States, each by virtue of a different authority. The States approach it, in the exercise of the police power, with which we are familiar. Congress approaches it in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce, with which we are also familiar. Which one of those sovereignties recedes? Which is the paramount authority? Which overrules the other, and occupies the whole field? We all know that Congress is the paramount authority, and its enactments the paramount law, as to all matters committed to its jurisdiction. There are many instances in which Congress proceeding under its interstate authority, and the States proceeding under their police power, may come into collision. When that collision actually occurs, the States must yield to the paramount authority of the Federal Government.

But in the instance in hand, is there any clashing of powers? Is it competent for the States to deal with the situation that is presented in the second section of this bill? Can they deal with it under their police powers? Unquestionably we can deal with it, under the interstate-commerce power. And we approach the problem, with far greater ability to make effective our assault upon this evil. It is a consideration that should be borne in mind by the gentlemen who oppose this bill, that we can handle this subject-matter far more efficiently than the States can possibly do, even if it is conceded that under the police power they have jurisdiction over the situation. They tell us that the States have never ceded their police power to the Government. That is true, and the Government has never given up its right to exercise the interstate-commerce power; and so long as the Constitution lasts, and this Government endures as at present, it can make effective all the authority that is lodged in it, and all the powers with which it is clothed, for the public welfare, and the Nation's needs.

The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation, should find itself incapable of disposing of any subject-matter specifically committed to its charge. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., pp. 546, 562.)

We are confronted with a situation, with respect to which, as I have said, the States possess no adequate power, or authority. Granting that they can deal with it measurably, we the paramount authority, can deal with it absolutely, effectively, conclusively, and constitutionally, and we are not to be hindered from doing our duty, by the suggestion that we are interfering with the police power, of the States, a suggestion which has never been followed up by the gentlemen in opposition, by showing how, and wherein, and to what extent, we rob a single sovereign, and indestructible State in this Union, of any police power which by right it possesses, and seeks to exercise.

We are not seeking to interfere, and do not interfere, by the enactment of this act, with the police powers of the States. We merely seek to occupy the field of interstate commerce, and to use our powers over that field, to meet and crush a traffic which has no right to a place in the world of honorable business. Congress alone is adequate to deal with this traffic in this field.

Gentlemen ask "What are the limits of the interstate-commerce power, when may it regulate, and when prohibit?" You might as well ask what are the limits of the police power. They have never been absolutely defined. These limits can not possibly be defined in any one decision, and it is well that the effort should not be made.

It is confessedly difficult to mark the precise boundaries of the police power, or to indicate by any general rule, the exact limitations which the States must observe in its exercise. (Henderson v. Mayor of New York, 92 U. S., p. 259, and cases there cited.)

The courts in substance say in relation to this power that time alone can determine, in the progress, and evolution of this country what cases will, and what cases will not, be referred to it. And so with respect to the interstate-commerce power. We can not say that we will fix for all time the delimitation of that power, and establish a standard which will determine automatically, and unerringly what cases will come within its exercise. We can only say that as the cases arise, it will be determined whether, or not, they come within its scope, and control.

While the power of Congress over commerce between the States is plenary, it is not contended that it is arbitrary, or that Congress undertaking to legislate pursuant to the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, may not enact prohibitory acts, which the courts will declare to be unconstitutional and void. But upon reason, and principle, and in the light of the authorities cited, it is not considered that this act falls within the class of unconstitutional enactments.

The lottery case affords all the specific authority needed to support the main proposition that this legislation is constitutional. There is no reason to suppose that this case will be reversed, for it is too well supported by reason, and authority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask unanimous consent for ten minutes in which to conclude my remarks along this line.

Mr. MANN. I am not able to yield ten minutes, but I shall not object to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania). The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the calendar contains quite a number of bills, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has already occupied two days. I regret to appear to be discourteous to the gentleman from Virginia, but I feel constrained to object to any prolongation of the debate on this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have reserved a very few minutes for myself, and other gentlemen, but I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I dislike to avail myself of the offer under the circumstances.

Mr. MANN. I prefer that the gentleman should take the time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to put this query. It is the query that is put by the Supreme Court in the Lottery cases. What clause of the Constitution of the United States can be cited—which in any wise countenances the suggestion, that one may of right carry from one State to another, that which will harm public morals? And that which is destructive to the morals of the country, is destructive to the best interests of the country. What clause of the Constitution can be relied upon to protect the men who carry on the despicable traffic which is sought to be restrained under the second section of this act, a traffic that might well bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the most degraded savage? Is it possible that a practice, which no one will admit is proper to be pursued, as a matter of right, can be clothed in some extraordinary way with the protection of the Constitution of the United States?

Is it a part of one's liberty, protected by the supreme law of the land, that he shall be allowed to introduce into commerce between the States, an element that will be confessedly injurious to public morals?

We have seen in the Lottery case that the Supreme Court related the enactment of the lottery legislation to moral considerations, in spite of the fact that the opponents of this bill claim that the Federal Government has nothing to do with regulating the morals of the country, or with the enactment of moral legislation. In that case the Supreme Court asked this question: "If the States can take into consideration the evils that inhere in the raising of money by lotteries, why may not Congress in its control over interstate commerce, keep the channels of that commerce free from the infection of lottery tickets?" I recite this question, because I wish to ask a like question in connection with the pending bill, which strikes at a greater and much more deep-seated evil, than was sought to be overthrown by the lottery legislation. If the States can deal with bawdy houses in their respective territory, why may not Congress provide that the instrumentalities of interstate commerce shall not be used to supply innocent victims for those resorts?

The objection to lotteries is a comparatively recent form of public sentiment. It is only in modern times that it has been considered that lotteries, and the raising of money by lotteries, are an evil, and yet when changed public sentiment recognized them as agencies for evil, the Supreme Court held, that in the exercise of our constitutional powers, we could have in mind the extent of the mischief, in the enactment of the legislation necessary to effect its destruction. But the traffic at which this bill strikes is admitted to be abhorrent to all men, and so long as a sense of decency exists, so long as civilization endures, with the high attributes with which we invest it, so long will this traffic continue to be abhorrent. The time will never arrive when there will be a change of sentiment with respect to its infamy and depravity. For all the ages to come, it will be under the ban of an adverse public opinion throughout the length and breadth of our country, and of the civilized world.

This being so, the principles announced in the Lottery case, afford us ample assurance that the proposed legislation against a far greater evil, is well within our constitutional powers. We are confronted with a traffic that is widespread, infamous, and degraded, one which the States are unable to deal with in all its phases, in the exercise of the police power. But that feature of the business which the States are powerless to reach, is not beyond our powers. Shall we not come to the aid of the States, and with beneficent purpose, afford the needed relief, through our control over interstate commerce?

The situation may be stated as follows: The proposed legislation is constitutional, and it is related to a moral consideration of the most compelling force. If it were not true that our penal legislation was related to moral questions, and moral considerations, then the whole fabric of that legislation would lose its power to command the approbation of the country. Fortunately such is not the case. Possessing the right to have these considerations in mind, in the enactment of legislation for the control of interstate traffic, we should not allow the unwarranted suggestion that the bill in hand will impinge upon the rights of the States—and I am as jealous of any real interference with those rights, as anyone could be—to hinder us from going forward on constitutional lines, and affording our contribution to the general movement to crush this traffic in human flesh, a traffic which oppresses the conscience of humanity, with a sense of overpowering horror. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise not to discuss the bill in particular, but merely to make a personal explanation. My personal and political friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, Judge BARTLETT, rather took me to task and in a mild and pleasant way criticised me along the line that I am inconsistent in supporting this bill, because, having been a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia for ten years, I had not introduced a bill to abolish or suppress bawdy houses in the District of Columbia. I admitted that I had not done so, but I think that in view of the fact that the charge of inconsistency was made against me I should make a statement in that connection so far as my services on the District Committee are concerned. I am willing to admit, and I am rather glad to admit, that I am not a self-constituted, pestiferous reformer. I have never yet introduced a bill affecting social conditions in the District of Columbia that I was not requested and importuned to introduce by a sufficiently large number of the people of the District of Columbia whom I thought had the good of the District at heart to justify such a measure. I introduced a bill to suppress race-track gambling in the District of Columbia, but not until the entire press of the District of Columbia had been clamoring for such action for a long time. I introduced the bill, and with the assistance of others secured the passage of it, but it was not on my own motion.

I introduced other bills of similar nature, but never on my own motion; but the suggestion did occur to me in considering this bill by the committee that to make it a felony to introduce or assist in bringing a person into this District for the purpose of prostitution, at least the maintaining of a house for such purposes in the District of Columbia, ought to be put under the same ban. We discussed that informally. Some members of the committee thought it might be regarded as an unfavorable amendment to the bill itself. I called up Major Sylvester and talked with him about the matter, and asked him if he thought such legislation as I proposed would be of benefit to the District. He said he thought it would not be of any benefit whatever. He said he thought at present that the matter was in the best condition for police control, and inasmuch as the gentleman whose duty it is to enforce laws governing such matters in the District so expressed himself, I thought it was my duty not to set up my individual judgment as against his. Therefore I did not offer the amendment, and I would not vote for it now, believing, as I do, that it would not help this measure, and neither would it help the conditions in the District of Columbia. As far as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and I are concerned, I expect that we have voted together as often as any two Members on the minority side of the House. Strange to say, I nearly always believe just as he does; but he has the independence, and I am glad to see him have it, to voice his convictions and stand by them though the heavens fall, and I only hope that I have that courage. I do not believe the gentleman meant any reflection upon me personally——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I want to disclaim any such thing. It was a mere matter of pleasantry. It was the only way that I could reply.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that it was merely a pleasantry, but being afraid that somebody may understand the criticism as having been serious, just as some may understand my own criticism of him in stating that I did not believe he always voted right to be serious, I thought it better to call attention to it. I admire the gentleman for standing by his convictions, though I do not agree with him as to the effect and construction which he places upon the Constitution of the United States as to the pending bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, which amendment was suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "other" and insert the word "any."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the moment which I have reserved I can only say that while the Supreme Court is the only tribunal which in the end can determine the constitutionality of any act passed by Congress, I doubt whether any bill proposed in Congress where the constitutional question can arise has ever been more carefully considered than has the pending measure now before the House. In my judgment, every provision in that bill is constitutional. In my opinion, we have the power under the commerce clause of the Constitution to provide, as is provided in the first sections of the bill, and we have the power under the international agreement, and under the regulation of immigration, to pass the last section of the bill, and having that power, Congress would be derelict in its duty if it did not exercise it, because all of the horrors which have ever been urged, either truthfully or fancifully, against the black-slave traffic pale into insignificance as compared with the horrors of the so-called "white-slave traffic." I hope that the amendments which I have proposed, to make the bill a little better, may be agreed to, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia to take the heart out of the bill will not be agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the agreement, general debate having been exhausted, the previous question is considered as ordered to the final passage of the bill and amendments thereto. Without objection, the Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, strike out the words "or evidence of the right to," and in line 11, after the word "transportation," insert "or evidence of the right thereto."

Mr. MANN. Those are committee amendments, and I think they will be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 11, insert after the word "within" the words "the district in."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 7, after the word "procuration," insert the word "of."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, in line 4, after the word "to," insert "the date of her entry into the United States, the port through which she entered."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning on page 5, line 20, at the words "every person," all down to and including the word "otherwise," on page 7.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "other" and insert the word "any."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 2, strike out the word "conclusively."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment on page 6, line 16.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 16, after the word "knowledge," strike out "and" and insert "or."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 7, after the words "shall include," insert "the district of Alaska," and in line 9 strike out "impart" and insert "import."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 6 the following:

"No person shall be excused from furnishing the statement, as required by this section, on the ground, or for the reason, that the statement so required by him, or the information therein contained, might tend to criminate him, or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture under any law of the United States for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may truthfully report in such statement, as required by the provisions of this section."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third bill, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to further regulate interstate and foreign commerce by prohibiting the transportation therein for immoral purposes of women and girls, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DECLARING PLATTE RIVER, MISSOURI, NONNAVIGABLE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 13437, and ask that the same may be reported by title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13437) to declare Platte River, in the State of Missouri, nonnavigable.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS CURRENT RIVER, CLAY COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 17743, on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17743) to authorize Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across Current River.

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Clay, in the State of Arkansas, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Current River at or near the point where the section line between sections 17 and 20, township 21 north, range 3 east, crosses said river in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out the words "its successors and assigns, be, and it."

In line 7, after the word "River," insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE KOOTENAI RIVER AT BONNERS FERRY, IDAHO.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 5040, on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5040) to authorize Bonners Ferry Bridge Commission to construct a bridge across the Kootenai River at Bonners Ferry, Idaho.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Bonners Ferry Bridge Commission, created by the legislature of Idaho under the provisions of an act approved March 17, 1909, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a free bridge and approaches thereto across the Kootenai River at Bonners Ferry, in the State of Idaho, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8, page 1, after the word "River," insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SNAKE RIVER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 3318.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3318) to legalize a bridge across the Snake River between the States of Idaho and Oregon.

Be it enacted, etc., That the bridge constructed across Snake River at the town of Ontario, Oreg., by the county court of Malheur County and the Ontario bridge commission be, and the same is hereby, legalized, and the consent of Congress is hereby given to its maintenance by the said corporations, their successors or assigns: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to exempt this bridge from the operation of the existing laws enacted by Congress for the protection of navigable waters, and any changes in the said structure which the Secretary of War may deem necessary and order in the interest of navigation shall be promptly made by the owners thereof at their own expense.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county court of Malheur County, in the State of Oregon, and the Ontario bridge commission to maintain and operate a bridge and approaches thereto now constructed across the Snake River at the town of Ontario, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges across navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906: Provided, The said county court of Malheur County and the said Ontario bridge commission shall within three months after the passage of this act file with the Secretary of War their acceptance of this act, together with plans and specifications of the said bridge, and said plans and specifications shall have been approved by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers; otherwise this act shall be null and void."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD BRIDGE ACROSS KANSAS RIVER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 4891.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls up the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4891) to extend the time for the commencement and completion of a railroad bridge across the Kansas River at or near Kansas City, Kans., in the county of Wyandotte, State of Kansas.

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the commencement by the Edgewater Connecting Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Kansas, of a railroad bridge across the Kansas River at or near Kansas City, in the county of Wyandotte, in the State of Kansas, under authorization of an act of Congress approved February 6, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, extended to May 1, 1911, and the time within which said bridge shall be fully completed be, and the same is hereby, extended to May 1, 1914, and that the act of February 6, 1909, authorizing the construction of said bridge be continued in full force and effect.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the time for commencing and completing the bridge authorized by the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Edgewater Connecting Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Kansas River at or near Kansas City, Kans., in the county of Wyandotte, State of Kansas,' approved February 6, 1909, is hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 11307, on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11307) to legalize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Hill City, Aitkin County, Minn.

Be it enacted, etc., That the bridge constructed across the Mississippi River at section 4, township 52 north, range 23 west, being in Aitkin County, in the State of Minnesota, by the Mississippi, Hill City and Western Railway Company be, and the same is hereby, legalized, and the consent of Congress is hereby given to its maintenance by said company: Provided, That any changes in the said structure which the Secretary of War may at any time deem necessary, and order in the interest of navigation, shall be promptly made by the owners thereof at their own expense.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

Amend the bill as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Mississippi, Hill City and Western Railway Company, a corporation of the State of South Dakota, to maintain and operate the bridge and approaches thereto now constructed across the Mississippi River at section 4, township 52 north, range 23 west, in Aitkin County, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That the said Mississippi, Hill City and Western Railway Company shall within three months after the passage of this act file with the Secretary of War their acceptance of this act, together with plans and specifications of the said bridge, and said plans and specifications shall have been approved by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers; otherwise this act shall be null and void."

Amend further by adding as section 2 the following:

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several bills reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were passed was laid upon the table.

POSTPONEMENT OF CONGRESS ON HYGIENE AND DEMOGRAPHY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will continue the call.

When the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called,

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the Senate joint resolution 55.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) authorizing the postponement of the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. As the joint resolution passed the Senate it carried an appropriation. As it is amended by the House it carries no appropriation, and it does properly belong on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the Clerk read the amendment as reported by the House committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the resolving clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the invitation extended by the President of the United States to the Fourteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography, in accordance with the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a 'joint resolution authorizing the President to extend an invitation to the Twelfth International Congress of Hygiene and Demography to hold its thirteenth congress in the city of Washington,' approved February 26, 1907, shall be modified and amended so that it shall provide for the holding of the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography at some place in the United States to be selected by the President in the year 1911 or 1912."

Amend further by striking out the preamble.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and we are therefore proceeding under the five-minute rule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think there is not very much necessity for explaining further in reference to this resolution. Those who were here the other day when the resolution relating to the same subject-matter was passed, thought it was an invitation to the Government. There was an invitation extended by the Congress in 1907 to the Congress of Hygiene and Demography at Berlin to meet in this city last year or this year. There has been a committee on organization formed, and that committee desires to have the time postponed. I suppose no one has any opposition to that. The original resolution and invitation which was extended provided that the congress should meet in this city. When the congress does meet it probably will have from 3,000 to 6,000 delegates in attendance. I called the attention of the gentlemen making this request to the fact, if we could judge by the Congress on Tuberculosis, that when this congress met they would ask for the use of the Capitol building and the office buildings of the House and Senate; and if I introduced a resolution on the subject I would alter it so the place of meeting might be changed, or, at least, they could not put us in the attitude where we had extended an invitation, and then must provide the Capitol building to hold the meeting in. That met with the acquiescence of the gentleman in charge, and as a result the resolution now simply authorizes the extension of the time from this year to 1911 or 1912, as they may determine hereafter, and to some other place, if it shall be thought desirable to hold the congress in some other place.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. What is hygiene and demography?

Mr. MANN. Well, I suppose the gentleman is familiar with what hygiene is. Demography is a term sometimes used relating to vital statistics—the birth, death, and progress of humanity. If the gentleman would recall his Greek, which I am sure he can much more easily recall than I can, and would examine the meaning of the word "demos"—the people—he could tell. It is a study of the people.

Mr. HARRISON. How does this international congress differ from the various other international conventions and congresses on sanitary matters?

Mr. MANN. Well, this international congress covers the broadest latitude that is covered by any of these congresses. We had a congress a year or so ago on tuberculosis, a specific subject. The Congress on Hygiene and Demography, in its broadest terms, covers the whole range of health and vital statistics.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the original resolution provide for an appropriation to properly entertain the visiting delegates?

Mr. MANN. The original resolution did not provide for any appropriation at all; but there was an appropriation carried in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill of $10,000, which appropriation is now available.

Mr. HARRISON. Will it be available in case this adjournment is taken?

Mr. MANN. I think not, unless it is reappropriated, as it undoubtedly should be.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill now pending the appropriation of $10,000 previously made is made available for the adjourned congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that the reason why the amendment was made not to make an appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. It did not require it.

Mr. MANN. In these resolutions, the gentleman will remember, it is the constant practice of the Senate to tack an appropriation on some provision of a resolution. It is not the practice of the House to do that, and I think the practice of the House is very much superior to the practice of the other body. We provide the law and expect the appropriation to come where you can find it, in an appropriation bill, where it belongs.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the amendment to the preamble of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up House joint resolution 106, on the House Calendar, and move that it lie on the table. That was the resolution as originally reported by the House committee, and it is unnecessary to take further action on it on account of the action just taken on the Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the House resolution will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

PERSONAL ESTATE OF CITIZENS DYING ABROAD.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the House bill 17433.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17433) amending section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1709 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1709. The Auditor for the State and Other Departments shall act as conservator of such part of these estates as may be received at the Treasury, and for their protection the Secretary of the Treasury may order such effects to be sold as may consist of jewelry or other articles which have heretofore or may hereafter be received at the Treasury, and pay the expenses of such sale out of the proceeds, provided application for these effects shall not be made by the legal claimant within two years after their receipt. The auditor is authorized to indorse all bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other evidences of indebtedness due to such estates, and to take such steps as may be necessary for their collection. The proceeds of such sales, together with such other moneys as may be collected by him, shall be deposited into the Treasury in trust for the legal claimant, and be reported to the Secretary of State."

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, strike out the words "to read as follows" and insert "by the addition of the following paragraph."

In line 5, strike out "Sec. 1709" and insert "Sixth."

Mr. PERKINS. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to offer two additional verbal amendments, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "nine," in line 3, page 1, the words: "Of the Revised Statutes of the United States;" and in line 1, page 2, strike out the word "be" and insert "have been."

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think I should state in reference to the last two amendments, which I have offered, that I owe them to the suggestion of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to whose careful examination of all pending legislation before this House we certainly owe a great debt. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will be taken on the committee amendments, including the amendments that are now submitted by the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Surely.

Mr. BENNET of New York. You are a much better lawyer than myself, so I can assume there is abundant legal authority for the bill, which I have read with more than the greatest of care; but where do we get authority to appoint an officer of the Government and give him power to pass title as to the effects of a citizen?

Mr. PERKINS. That comes from the laws of the United States. They regulate the inheritance of property, and it is for the laws of the United States to regulate. The inheritance of property is by provision of law. Without a provision of law no man could devise his property at all. It is only by a legal enactment that the property of any man who dies is collected, distributed, and administered. That is by provision of law.

Now, certain property of citizens dying abroad, under some circumstances, comes into the Treasury of the United States and is held there until the title is established and the property turned over to the proper heirs. There can be no question that we have the power to authorize the officers of the United States to turn into money or to collect evidences of indebtedness, and that the power thus vested in them would be exactly as good as the power that is vested in an administrator de bonis non.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman says so, I know it is so. The question came up in my mind.

Mr. PERKINS. I think it is so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution and bill were passed was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there anything more from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. PERKINS. Nothing further.

The Committee on Military Affairs was called.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FE RAILROAD, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs to call up House joint resolution 101, authorizing an extension of the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad on the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

House joint resolution 101.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company to extend its tracks on the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., in such manner as he may deem expedient, for the purpose of connecting said tracks with the government terminal switch tracks on that reservation: Provided, That such extension shall be made without expense to the United States.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution simply confers authority upon the War Department to exercise its judgment as to permitting this extension, and I ask that it be passed.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13410) to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War be, and hereby are, modified to read as follows:

"ART. 122. If, upon marches, guards, or in quarters, different corps of the army happen to join or do duty together, the officer highest in rank of the line of the Army, Marine Corps, organized militia, or volunteers, by commission, there on duty or in quarters, shall command the whole, and give orders for what is needful in the service, unless otherwise specially directed by the President, according to the nature of the case."

"ART. 124. Officers of the organized militia of the several States, when called into the service of the United States, shall, on all detachments, courts-martial, and other duty, wherein they may be employed in conjunction with the regular or volunteer forces of the United States, take rank next after all officers of the like grade in said regular forces, and shall take precedence of all officers of volunteers of equal or inferior rank, notwithstanding the commissions of such militia officers may be older than the commissions of the said officers of the regular forces of the United States."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this only changes the present law to conform to the recent laws as to the militia and volunteers. When the Articles of War were adopted by the Congress, the militia included all able-bodied males between the ages of 18 and 45. Now we have a law organizing what is called the "organized militia" or "national guard." This bill puts in before the word "militia" the word "organized." In addition to that it recognizes what our volunteer law recognizes as a third line, called the "volunteers," and it simply adds the words "or volunteers," so that in place of reading "Army, Marine Corps, and militia," it reads "Army, Marine Corps, organized militia or volunteers." These changes make it comply with the laws already upon our statute books as to the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Is this bill recommended by the War Department?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is recommended by the War Department, and sent to us by the Assistant Secretary of War in response to a unanimous request of the national-guard organizations of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there any further business from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Nothing further.

The Committee on Naval Affairs was called.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs may be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. I want to say to my colleague that it was agreed the other day that, since calendar Wednesday has been instituted, we would not pass any committee without prejudice. The gentleman's committee will be reached again very soon.

SALE AND DISPOSITION OF INDIAN LANDS IN NORTH DAKOTA AND SOUTH DAKOTA.

The Committee on Indian Affairs was called.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I call up the bill (H. R. 12438) to amend sections 7 and 8 of the act of May 29, 1908, entitled

"An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect."

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the committee will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to pay to the Indians belonging to the Cheyenne and Standing Rock tribes in my State and in North Dakota $1.25 an acre for about 150,000 acres of land, being land that was ceded to the State as school lands under a bill that passed in the first session of the Sixtieth Congress. That bill provided that sections 16 and 36 should be ceded to the State for school purposes, and as it became a law it provided that the Government should pay only $1.25 an acre therefor.

The purpose, as already stated in this bill, is to pay $1.25 an acre additional to the $1.25 that has already been paid. I may say, going back to 1907, that a bill was introduced in this House authorizing the sale of a certain portion of the Cheyenne and Standing Rock Indian reservations in my State, providing that sections 16 and 36 should be ceded to the State for school purposes, and providing that there should be paid for the school sections $1.25 an acre.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by letter transmitted through the Secretary of the Interior, requested that there be no action upon that bill until there had been some negotiations with the Indians occupying these reservations. Major McLaughlin, an inspector in the Indian service, a man who has had thirty-eight years' experience in dealing with the Indians, was sent to the reservation with the bill which I have referred to.

He took up the different provisions of this bill, held a number of councils with the Indians, agreed with them as to the provisions in the bill, except that they demanded $2.50 an acre for sections 16 and 36, instead of $1.25, as proposed in the bill.

Mr. McLaughlin promised the Indians that he would recommend that the price of these lands be fixed at $2.50 an acre. He made his report, and upon the filing of that report in the Interior Department the Secretary of the Interior transmitted to Congress a communication in which he called attention to the report of Major McLaughlin, sent a copy of it to the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate, and called particular attention to the fact that there was an understanding that the price of the school section was to be $2.50 an acre, instead of $1.25 an acre.

The Senate committee, in considering the bill in the Senate, which had been introduced with the $1.25 price, the same as in the House, amended the bill, fixing the price at $2.50 an acre, and the bill passed the Senate in that form. It came over to the House and was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs by the committee having jurisdiction thereof.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is some question about what happened after the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and after it was reported and when it passed the House. I did not happen at that time to be a member of either the Committee on Indian Affairs or of the House, so I am obliged to speak by what I find in the RECORD and what I can learn from Members who were upon the committee at the time.

I find and I hold in my hand a copy of the report made upon the bill H. R. 1385, first session of the Sixtieth Congress, and I find by that report that the bill fixed the price of school lands at $2.50 an acre and was amended by striking out 50 cents and leaving the price $2 instead of $2.50 an acre.

I call attention further to the report where it states an appropriation is made to pay the Indians for these lands, namely, the school sections at $2 per acre. The report says:

Sections 16 and 36 are reserved as school lands for the States of North Dakota and South Dakota, which is in accordance with the enabling acts of these States. An appropriation is made to pay the Indians for these lands at the rate of $2 per acre.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I now find in the RECORD that on May 26, 1908, Mr. Sherman, the then chairman of the committee, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and as the bill is printed in the RECORD it appears that the price of these lands was $1.25 an acre instead of $2 an acre as it should have been, according to the report made by the committee. When the price from $2 to $1.25 an acre was changed I do not know, and I have been unable to obtain any information that it ever was changed, except that in calling up the bill they must have gotten hold of the bill as originally introduced, which provided a price, as I have already stated, of $1.25 an acre.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Why, the bill that was called up was a Senate bill, and the Senate bill that is called up is the engrossed bill coming from the Senate. There is no such possibility as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can only say that the RECORD shows that the price was $1.25 an acre, as the bill was printed. I have in my hand a report of the Committee on Indian Affairs——

Mr. MANN. So have I.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Which fixed the price at $2 per acre.

Mr. MANN. I will give the gentleman the information as to how it got changed. He has not been able to discover it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I thought I stated very fairly that I did not know how it had occurred. I have no doubt that my genial friend from Illinois, when he gets an opportunity in his own time, will be able to tell the House exactly where and how that change took place. I am unable to do so; but I find, Mr. Chairman, that when this bill was considered in the House members of the Committee on Indian Affairs protested against its passage because of the fact that it proposed to pay only $1.25 to the Indians instead of $2.50 an acre.

The bill was considered under a suspension of the rules, and it would have been impossible to amend it, and it was either a question of defeating it or passing it in the form in which it was presented and trusting to the conferees to make the change to the price of $2.50. I find that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] in his remarks said that he would support the bill only because he had confidence in the conferees that they would do justice to these Indians and change the price to $2.50 an acre, as passed by the Senate and in accordance with the agreement that had been made with these Indians. I find that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], a member of the committee, refused to support the bill because of the fact that it did not carry out the agreement made with the Indians, and he and others of his colleagues, especially on that side of the House, voted against the passage of the bill because, as he stated, it was doing an injustice to these Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask how long before this bill passed was it that this agreement had been made.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Just a few months; I could not say just how long it was.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is the same bill that we have the statement of Major McLaughlin upon, to the effect that the Indians agreed to take $2.50?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that they stood by that still?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And demanded that the Government should be fair with them and carry out that agreement.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They insisted they be paid $2.50 an acre, and Major McLaughlin promised, just as much as he could promise, that they would receive $2.50 an acre if the bill was enacted into law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Was he an agent of the Government sent out there for the purpose of making this treaty with them?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That was the purpose, and it was in accordance with article 12 of the agreement made with the Indians in 1889 that further disposition of their reservations should be made after negotiations with some representative of the Interior Department, and the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to appoint a person to so negotiate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, is it not a fact that we are bound as far as we can be bound by that treaty with the Indians to pay them $2.50 an acre?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My judgment is that we are, or I would not be advocating the passage of this bill.

I want to call attention, Mr. Chairman and Members of this House, to one paragraph in the report made by the commission which negotiated the treaty of 1889 with the Sioux Indians in South and North Dakota. After commenting on the manner in which the Government had treated with Indians theretofore, and perhaps suggesting that the Government had not always kept faith with them, the commission made this suggestion:

The Indians of this generation should be made to feel that the performance of the Nation is equal to its promises.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all I am here for at this time is to demand that the Government keep its promise with these Indians and pay to them the price for the land that we agreed to pay through our representative who was sent there to negotiate with them under authority of law. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention for a moment to another thing that perhaps will be new to the Members of this House. The agreement made with the Sioux Indians in 1889 provided that the proceeds from the sale of the surplus and unused lands when sold should be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians and thereafter be subject to appropriations by Congress for their civilization, education, and support, so that the moneys that these Indians receive from the sales of the lands authorized to be sold under the act we now propose to amend will not receive any benefit except that they will be supported thereafter from the funds that go into the Treasury from the sale of the lands, instead of being supported under the provisions of the treaty of 1877, which obligates the Government for all time to provide for them until they are self-supporting.

And, I will say in the Indian appropriation bill, which is now upon the calendar of this House, that the committee reduced the appropriation for the support of the Sioux Indians, and particularly the Indians affected by the pending bill, to the extent of $150,000, and provides that that amount should be appropriated from the money belonging to these Indians in the Treasury instead of taking it out of the public funds belonging to the United States. So that if we pass this bill we will put into the Treasury to the credit of the Indians somewhere near $200,000, and next year we will take it out for their care, their support, and their education, and if we do not put this money into the Treasury to their credit we will take money out of the public funds for their care and support. Therefore we practically accomplish nothing so far as the Indian is concerned, except that we keep the solemn promise and obligation made by the Government when the Indians consented that the surplus and unallotted lands described in the act which was passed, to which I referred in the opening part of my remarks, might be sold and disposed of. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that no man can object to the passage of this bill, and let us from this time forth declare and let the Indians understand that when we make an agreement with them we are going to keep it by carrying out to the letter what we promised to do. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. SABATH. Have these lands been disposed of?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The lands have not been disposed of. Under the terms of the law the Indian first had to be allotted.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. After the allotments were completed then the lands had to be examined by the Geological Survey, to ascertain whether or not there was any mineral land to be affected. Then a commission was to be appointed, consisting of one resident of South Dakota, one Indian having tribal relations with the tribe, and one representative from the Interior Department, to appraise the lands and fix the price at which they should be disposed of to settlers under the provisions of the homestead law. That commission has completed its work and its report is on file, and the present intention is that on the 1st of April, if the time is not extended until the 1st of May, these lands will be open to settlement to homestead settlers.

Mr. SABATH. So these lands have not as yet been opened for homestead settlement?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They are not as yet subject to homestead entry.

Mr. SABATH. But I understood the gentleman to state the report of the commission is now ready to publish.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is not published, Mr. Chairman, although I know what it contains, so far as the value of the lands is concerned, if that is what the gentleman refers to. The price of the land, I understand, is from $6 an acre down to 50 cents.

Mr. SABATH. I was not interested in the price; I was interested in the disposal of the lands—how they were to be disposed of.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Under the homestead law, by what is known as the registering——

Mr. SABATH. Under the same old process.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The same process that is commonly referred to as a lottery, but is not, in fact, a lottery.

Mr. SABATH. That is the information I desired. I expect, when the time presents itself, to try to amend the law under which these lands have been disposed of.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take very much of the time of the House, but this is one of those very peculiar cases which I think ought to be brought to the attention of the House. My friend from Minnesota suggests that the Government ought to keep an agreement with the Indians. Very well; but the Indians ought to keep an agreement with us. Now, what are the facts in this case? On December 9, 1907, one of the Senators from South Dakota introduced the bill (S. 1385) in the Sixtieth Congress for the purpose of allotting lands in this Indian reservation, and so forth, and, among other things, for the purpose of setting aside sections 16 and 36 in each township, to be paid for by the United States at $1.25 per acre.

That was the original motion of the gentleman representing the great State of South Dakota, who introduced the bill which finally became a law. For years it has been the policy of our Government to give certain sections of the public lands to the States for school purposes, and although originally the public land, or much of it, was sold under the various laws and the ownership of it was considered as an asset of the Government, under the recent practice of the United States the ownership of the public lands is not only not an asset, but a distinct liability, because we not only give away the land which we do not give to the States, but in case of the Indian lands, we buy from the Indians in order to give to the States.

This bill was amended when it was reported into the Senate, so as to make its price $2.50 an acre, and all of the facts in reference to an Indian agent or an agent of the Indian Office who visited these Indians were known and laid before Congress. It passed the Senate with the provision for $2.50 per acre that the Government should pay to the Indians for these lands to present to the States of North and South Dakota. It came to the House at $2.50 an acre.

The Committee on Indian Affairs considered the matter and reported the bill back to the House, providing the striking out of the $2.50 an acre and inserting $2 an acre. The matter pended before the House some time on the Union Calendar. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], and some other distinguished gentleman who has spoken elsewhere, has stated that they could not find out, or did not know, how the bill finally passed at $1.25 an acre; that it was stated in another distinguished body, not far distant, that it was by an accident that nobody could discover. If Congress gets to the point that it accidentally strikes out $2.50 an acre for the land it has to pay for and accidentally puts in $1.25 an acre, it is time we discovered those accidents.

What, though, are the facts? The distinguished gentleman who now presides over the Senate of the United States was the chairman of that distinguished committee, the Committee on Indian Affairs. This matter was discussed among the Members of the House, as to whether it should be the policy of the Government in opening Indian reservations and giving two sections in a township to the States, to pay more for this land than had been the custom in the past. As I recall, there never has been a case where the Government has paid more than the $1.25 an acre. If so, this land is worth more. Very well. Who made it worth more? Was it the Indians who have raised the value of this land from $1.25 an acre to $6 an acre, as the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] says it is now worth? Is it not doing pretty well by the Indians if we make the settlers pay to them the increase in the value of the land which the white settlers have made, and not a cent's worth due to the work of the Indians themselves?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I always yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Did I understand the gentleman to say that prior to the time when the bill referred to passed that $1.25 an acre was the highest price that had been paid to Indians for these lands that were ceded to the States?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know whether the gentleman so understood me or not.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, I wanted to see, if I did so understand, why he makes the statement.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing for the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish to say this, because I know the gentleman wants to be fair and does not want to mislead the House.

Mr. MANN. Cut that out, as everybody knows that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say in two propositions similar to this in my State prior to the time this bill was considered, Congress paid $2.50 an acre to the Indians for sections 16 and 36.

Mr. MANN. Well, very likely. It has been the practice of the Government to pay $1.25, and I can readily see why the evil effects of the precedent that has crept in sometimes of paying more than that, should thereby encourage gentlemen in making an effort to open the Treasury. Now, the gentlemen had all these facts before them when this bill was up. A distinguished gentleman, now the Vice-President, who has as much knowledge of Indian affairs as any man in this country, and a very careful protector of the Indians' interests in these lands, proposed in this House to make this rate $1.25 an acre. There was no mistake about it; there was no question about it. Some gentlemen then on the committee opposed the proposition on the floor of the House, for the reason that this amount was cut down; but the House, with a full understanding of the subject, determined itself to make the rate $1.25 an acre.

The Senate accepted that. In every essential particular that was a contract between the House and the Indians and the people who are interested in having this reservation opened, that this provision should remain in the bill; and yet the moment when they have secured the enactment of legislation permitting them to open this reservation, on terms such as they seek, they want to come in here and open up a part of the bill which is greatly to their interests without offering to open those parts which are contrary, in my opinion, to the interest of the public. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask one further question.

Mr. MANN. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The report upon this bill, as I have stated, and as the gentleman from Illinois states, shows that the price fixed by the committee was $2 an acre.

Mr. MANN. Wait a moment; but the committee does not fix the price. The price, as recommended by the committee, was at $2 an acre.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Very well. Can the gentleman tell us when the proposition was changed or fixed at $1.25, and by whose authority it was done?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly, I will tell the gentleman. I have already told the House. When the gentleman gives me attention, I will tell him again.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman if the bill was not passed under a suspension of the rules, and Members on the floor made the statement that they voted for it believing that the conferees would do justice to the Indians and agree to the price as fixed by the Senate?

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I do not know what every Member on the floor might have said, or what he believed. If he believed such a conversation would change the action of the House, why, he ought to be seeking a home at an asylum.

Now, the bill was presented to the House. It was before the House, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman] moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment which he offered. The bill was read with this amendment. When this amendment was presented the House was not graced with the presence of the gentleman from South Dakota, much to my personal regret; but I remember the presentation of the bill as distinctly as if it were yesterday.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I observe from the RECORD that the gentleman was in the House, as he usually is when there is any business being transacted; but the gentleman has not yet said how this amendment got in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I have said it seven or eight times, and am ready to say it again, if the gentleman will permit me.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman], chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments which he sent up, and one of those amendments was the amendment changing the rate from $2.50 an acre to $1.25 an acre. Does not that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No; it does not. The chairman of the committee was supposed to report the bill to the House as directed by his committee.

Mr. MANN. Why, the gentleman from South Dakota certainly has been on this floor long enough to know that even in moving to suspend the rules or call up a bill the chairman in charge of the bill offers an amendment which the committee has not recommended. I have just offered four in that shape, and had them adopted by the House this afternoon on bills which passed.

It is not an uncommon thing. Gentlemen frequently do it. The truth is, that bill never could have passed the House except for the change that was made, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman], then chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, himself believed that the change ought to be made, and so stated.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If he so stated, he did not state it in the presence of this House, or at least it does not appear in the RECORD, which I have before me. At least, I have not found it.

Mr. MANN. I will not undertake to remember what the gentleman stated on the floor of the House, but I know he made that statement, and he will make that statement now, I think, if the gentleman will go to him.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not yet see what right he would have to submit any amendment, except as reported by the committee.

Mr. MANN. It is very peculiar that the gentleman can not get that particular parliamentary proposition into his mind. It certainly is not only a common practice, but it is a legitimate practice. It is the proper thing to do. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman] never betrayed any power which he had in the House. He never betrayed the committee which he represented on the floor of the House. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] would indicate that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman], the present Vice-President of the United States, offered a motion on the floor of the House which he had no moral right to make. That is preposterous. He offered the amendment. It was agreed to by the House. It became the law; but the moment they had opened this Indian reservation under this provision of the law, these gentlemen come in and say we ought to raise the price. Both they and the Senate were mighty willing to take the law with the change which was made by the House. They were much more anxious to obtain the law and the other provisions in it than they were to stand on this particular provision. But having secured the benefits resulting from the balance of the act, they are now trying to renege on this particular proposition. I am against it. I think when a fair proposition is made everybody ought to stand by it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman remember whether the Senate agreed to the House amendment or whether the bill went to conference?

Mr. MANN. The Senate agreed to the House amendment, as I remember.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the reason why these Indians should have $2.50 an acre instead of $1.25 an acre is on account of the agreement made with the United States Government that they should have $2.50 an acre?

Mr. MANN. Absolutely no such agreement was ever entered into, nor was anybody empowered to make such an agreement. Does the gentleman from Texas undertake to say that an Indian agent can go out to an Indian tribe and make an agreement which is binding, where the law requires that Congress shall act? Do I understand that a subordinate in the Indian Office, in the opinion of the gentleman, can go out and make an agreement as to the amount of money that Congress shall pay for land? I never have heard such a preposterous proposition seriously put forward before in the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That has been the practice for years.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indians agreed that they would permit the lands to be sold at a stated price, and we would be violating the faith of the Government with those Indians by taking the lands from them unless we pay them that amount.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They do not have to take $1.25 an acre, do they, unless they want to?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Should we not keep a promise made to the Indians as faithfully as a promise made by the Government of the United States to one of its own citizens?

Mr. MANN. There has been no promise made. Why does the gentleman keep stating that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the agent of the Government, Major McLaughlin, is directly contradicted by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I say the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I always prefer to believe the gentleman from Illinois on questions concerning which he is posted, but he certainly does not know what contracts Major McLaughlin made with these Indians.

Mr. MANN. I know as much about it as the gentleman from Texas does. We both get our information from the same source. I have read the statement. I wonder if the gentleman from Texas has. I doubt it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to enlighten him?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Section 12 of the agreement made with the Sioux Indians in 1889, dividing the Sioux Reservation into separate reservations and providing for the allotting of lands to the Indians, contains these words:

That any time after land has been allotted to all the Indians of any tribe as herein provided, or sooner, if in the opinion of the President it shall be for the best interests of said tribe, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with such tribe for the purchase and lease by said tribe, in conformity with the treaty or statute under which such reservation is held, of such portions of its reservation not allotted as such tribe shall from time to time consent to sell on such terms and conditions as shall be considered just and equitable between the United States and said tribe of Indians, which purchase shall not be complete until ratified by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Is that the law now?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the law.

Mr. MANN. Then, what do you come here for? If they have the power now in the department to purchase the land at such price as they agree upon, what is the gentleman doing here?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But it must be ratified by Congress. Now, the gentleman asked a moment ago by what authority Colonel McLaughlin was out there.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said nothing of the kind. The trouble with the gentleman is that he has been talking with somebody else and was not listening to what I said.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I heard what the gentleman said.

Mr. MANN. What I said was that Colonel McLaughlin, if that is his title, had no authority to make an agreement with the Indians binding on the United States. Does the gentleman from South Dakota contend that he had the authority?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not unless it was ratified by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Had he the authority?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. He certainly had the authority to negotiate.

Mr. MANN. To make an agreement? If this man had authority to make an agreement, the gentleman from South Dakota would not be here with this bill. All that he was authorized to do was to tell them what he would endeavor to do. No negotiator had the authority to make an agreement binding on the United States, and they well understood it, because they made no binding agreement, and did not pretend to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They did, subject to its ratification by Congress.

Mr. MANN. They recommended to Congress. There is no question of fact between the gentleman from South Dakota and myself. The Indian agent recommended to Congress the payment of $2.50 an acre. He told the Indians that he would recommend the payment of $2.50 an acre, and that is all he did. That recommendation was laid before Congress. It may be that Congress has no authority, moral or legal, to override the opinion of this Indian inspector, but somehow or some way it did do it, and with all these opinions before Congress, Congress did not choose to follow the recommendation of the Indian agent as to this price and provided otherwise under the lead of the present Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to be understood as saying that the Government ought to disregard these negotiations, which practically amount to an agreement, for the sake of saving $1.25 an acre on a small area of land, where the proceeds are going to be used for the support and civilization of the Indians?

Mr. MANN. That question reminds me of the question that is sometimes put to an expert witness. It is so long I forgot what the first of it was before the gentleman finished. But I will say to the gentleman, of course we do regard any statement that the Indian agents make. We have regarded it and considered it; we have given it all the force it is entitled to, and we have overruled it by the legislation which we enacted, as we had a right to enact.

Now the gentleman wants Congress to overrule itself, on the ground that it did not know what it was doing when it disregarded the opinion of the Indian agent. Do I understand that the gentleman appeals from Congress to the Indian agent? That is a new supreme court—appealing from the action of the House to the opinion of a subordinate officer in the Indian department.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The two contracting parties are the Indian tribes and the United States Government. Is not that true?

Mr. MANN. I am not on cross-examination, and the gentleman can make his own statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That being true, then, the minds of the two parties must have met to make a contract. The Indians never agreed to take less than $2.50 an acre, and what right has Congress to say that they shall take $1.25 an acre? Shall we exercise the right of the giant and pay these Indians less than half they agreed to sell for, when they have never agreed to take less than $2.50? Let us be fair and just to the Indians.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman always ends his speech with that. I do not care whether the Indians take this $1.25 or not. I am perfectly willing that they should continue to keep this land; but bring this whole proposition in before the House again, and not bring in a part of it. It is an effort to amend a particular section of a bill, because it happens that that opens the door of the Treasury and is against the Government, without amending any of the sections of the bill which might be so amended as to protect the Government; that I protest against. The gentleman himself does not wish to repeal the other sections of the act and neither do the Indians. They would far rather have that act stand as it is without an amendment than to have it repealed.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am good-natured and am willing to yield all the time.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The gentleman stated in the outset that the Government would keep its agreement, but the Indians should also keep their agreement. Will the gentleman advise the House where these Indians have not kept their agreement with the Government?

Mr. MANN. If the Indians accepted this act—and I understand they have accepted it and appointed a commission under it——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. They had no alternative.

Mr. MANN. They had no alternative? Ah, ha, that is another proposition. If they have accepted the act, as they have, then they ought to keep the agreement in the act, and not attempt to break that part of it which does not happen to suit them. Let it stand as a whole or fall as a whole.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to occupy the time of the House again this afternoon, but this is a matter that comes from the committee of which I am a member, and I am entirely familiar with it. This is a very simple question. It is a mere question of the application of the ordinary principles of good faith to a contract. That is all, nothing more and nothing less. We made an agreement with these Indians so far as we can make an agreement with an Indian tribe. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in one respect is technically correct. No agreement, however solemn, can be made with the Indians with respect to which we have not reserved to ourselves the high prerogative of overruling it, that is, breaking it. To that extent he is right. But in this instance we went ahead, and made an agreement with these Indians, which they recognized as affording the terms upon which they parted with their land. They dealt with a representative of this Government, and they thought that as a consideration for what they were surrendering, they would receive $2.50 per acre for the lands, covered by the contract. It is the government agents who testify to this effect, and not the Indians, and it is the government agents who inform us of dissatisfaction on the part of the Indians, because we have not carried out our contract with them.

We have the brutal power to say that we will not pay these Indians anything for their land. But shall we exercise this power? Economy is all right, but economy practiced at the expense of good faith, is not a very desirable policy to pursue [applause], nor are its results to be held as a very precious possession on the part of this great Government. When contracting parties are equal, and keep faith, it is regarded as a matter of credit to the parties. How much more to our credit will it be, to keep faith, when we deal with our helpless, dependent, domestic wards? That is the whole proposition here. We have agreed to give them $2.50, and we have not given it to them, and this bill proposes that we shall now do, what we ought to have done at the last session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question, as affecting the matter of good faith?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Did not the gentleman make this statement to the House at the time this bill passed the House before by more than a two-thirds vote?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It did not pass by more than a two-thirds vote according to my recollection.

Mr. MANN. Well, it did, and the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is not my recollection that it did, but a two-thirds vote does not make right that which is wrong. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The House was fully advised at that time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know how many people were in the House, or whether they were fully advised, or not.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit me to state what the vote was? It was 139 ayes, noes 79.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then, that is not two-thirds.

Mr. MANN. Why, it is two-thirds; and the gentleman is still mistaken.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Twice 9 is 18 and twice 7 is 14 and 1 is 15——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is assuming that two-thirds means twice as many.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman has another arithmetical computation coming.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I assume the gentleman meant by his statement that there were twice as many votes for the proposition as against it.

Mr. MANN. What I said was that two-thirds voted for it, did I not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know what the gentleman had in mind. That is what I had in mind. However, that is irrelevant and immaterial anyway.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman is as far mistaken now, as he was about the other proposition.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I was trying to find out what the gentleman meant. I am not mistaken in my recollection of the merits of this proposition, and I will try to inform the House as to them in a moment. It is true that a recommendation to pay $2 per acre came before the House, and from the committee, but it came over the protest of quite a number of the members of that committee. The House committee agreed to put the compensation for these lands at $2 per acre instead of $2.50, as provided for in the Senate. How this got to be $1.25, in the final form, I do not understand. I do not know any more about that than the gentleman knows. The committee understood that it was to be $2, and I was opposed to that reduction of the agreed amount. It was my recollection that the House voted $2 last year, and not $1.25. However that may be, I want to present the merits of the pending proposition. Major McLaughlin was the representative of the Government, in the negotiations with the Indians. He states that the Indians understood that they were to receive $2.50 for their land. The agreement as reported to us provided for $2.50. The Indians turned over whatever rights they had, in consideration of that undertaking on our part. We can not undertake to say that we were overreached; we can not say we were misled; we can not say that the consideration has failed, because the land is worth far more than the $2.50 per acre, but what difference does it make whether it is worth less, or more? Even if it was worth less, still we agreed to take it on the terms contained in our understanding with the Indians. Shall we exercise our brute force, and override this agreement, merely because we can do it, and for no better reasons than those so far advanced on the floor of this House?

Sometimes, Mr. Chairman, a man whose note is out of date, but who is amply able to pay every dollar of it, settles his liability at 50 cents on the dollar. That man is not regarded very highly in the world of honorable men, but his attitude is preferable to the course recommended to us. If we undertake to settle at $1.25 an acre, then we are discharging our obligation at 50 cents on the dollar. We will pay $1.25 an acre for land that on an average is worth $5 an acre, and for which we agreed to pay $2.50 per acre. Our ability to pay is infinite, and our contract is still in full force—I was about to say "and virtue," but some gentlemen here do not seem to think that there is much virtue in keeping faith with dependent Indians. But here is the contract and nothing has ever emanated from the Indians to indicate that they have been satisfied with their treatment. They have protested from the beginning.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption there for him to give me some information?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will afford the information, if I can.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was not in the House at the time this bill passed. The gentleman from Illinois has stated, in the presence of the House, that the act contained a number of provisions, some of which were favorable to the Indians and some to the Government, but that the act as a whole was substantially accepted by the Indians by their acting under it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What else could they do?

Mr. DOUGLAS. But there was an agreement by a commission, or something of that kind. I suggest simply, if that be true, and the Indians have substantially accepted this in view of other benefits contained——

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will answer that in this way: If a party who is able to accept a contract, or to reject it as a whole, accepts it in a modified form, he will be bound by his acceptance. But this is in the case of a free agent. In such a case, when he acts under a contract with modifications, his conduct will be taken as evidence that he has agreed to the modifications, and he will be bound by the contract in its modified form. But this principle does not apply to the case in hand. The Indians could do nothing else but what they did, and they have protested from the very beginning that they were not receiving that which the Government had contracted to give them. Up to the present it has been a matter of $1.25 per acre, or nothing.

The evidence is here in the report before us that the Indians have objected to our breach of faith, and complained that they were not receiving the agreed consideration. All that the Indians were to receive as a consideration for the lands ceded was the price of $2.50 per acre, for a portion of their lands. Talk about the Indians keeping faith with respect to the other matters, wherein have they failed to keep faith? I defy anyone to point out any particular in respect to which they have broken faith.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask a simple question. Would it have been possible for the Indians to have rejected this law?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all. What else could they do, than what they have done? They accepted a situation that they could not amend, correct, or reject. An acceptance of that sort should not cause a man, or a body of men, to lose their contract rights.

Mr. KEIFER. In other words, the United States passed a law, and proceeded to execute it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, by virtue of brute force. In substance we have said to these Indians by the act of a year ago, something like this: "It is true we have taken your lands and opened your reservation. It is true you have kept the faith on your part. It is true that we agreed to give you $2.50 per acre for your lands, and that these lands are worth about $5 an acre. All of this is true, but we have now determined that we will cancel this agreement, retain your land, and pay you only $1.25 per acre." We proceeded to break faith with the Indians by the exercise of our paramount authority, and it is not much to our credit that we have done so. In conclusion, I repeat what I said in the beginning that the question before us is merely the application of the ordinary principles of honesty, fair dealing, good faith, and integrity, to our dealings with our domestic wards. That is all. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I call for a reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 7 and 8 of the act of May 29, 1908, entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriations and provision to carry the same into effect," are amended, and as so amended are reenacted to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That sections 16 and 36 of the land in each township within the tract described in section 1 of this act shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $2.50 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the States of South Dakota and North Dakota for such purpose as the same are located in the said States, respectively; and in case any of said sections, or parts thereof, are lost to said States by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governors of said States, respectively, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, are hereby authorized, within the area in the respective States described in section 1 of this act, to locate other lands not occupied not exceeding 2 sections in any one township, which shall be paid for by the United States as herein provided, in quantity equal to the loss, and such selections shall be made prior to the opening of such lands to settlement: Provided, That in any event not more than 2 sections shall be granted to the State in any one township, and lands, must be selected in lieu of sections 16 or 36, or any part thereof, within the township in which the loss occurs, except in any township where there may not be 2 sections of unallotted lands, in which event whatever is required to make 2 sections may be selected in any adjoining township.

"SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of not more than $415,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, as provided in section 7 of this act. And there is hereby appropriated the further sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making the appraisement and classification and allotments provided for herein: Provided, That the latter appropriation, or any further appropriation hereafter made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds received from the sale of the lands described herein or from any money in the Treasury belonging to said Indian tribes, respectively."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12438, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF SECTIONS 246 AND 247, REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

When the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department was called,

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department to call up for present consideration the bill H. R. 18586.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18586) amending sections 246 and 247, Revised Statutes.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 246 and 247 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows: "The Secretary of the Treasury may, by an appointment under his hand and official seal, delegate authority to the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury to sign in his stead, and he may in like manner delegate such authority to a clerk in his office to sign in his name, all warrants for the payment of money into the Public Treasury and all warrants for the disbursement from the Public Treasury of money certified by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to be due upon accounts duly audited and settled by them; also all accountable warrants placing money in the Treasury to the credit of disbursing and other fiscal officers, and all appropriations, repay, and transfer warrants. The warrants so signed by either of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury or by the designated clerk shall be in all cases of the same validity as if they had been signed by the Secretary of the Treasury himself."

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, under the present law authority is delegated to one Assistant Secretary of the Treasury to sign warrants. The purpose of this bill is to confer the same power upon the other two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and also upon one clerk. I want to read for the information of the House a portion of a letter addressed to the committee by the Acting Secretary, Mr. Norton. I may say in passing that this bill was seriously considered by the committee, and it comes to the House with a unanimous report favoring its passage. The Secretary says:

For your information I submit herewith copies of the various kinds of warants which come to my desk for signature, and the signing of which it is desired to delegate to an authorized clerk. At certain hours of the day, and particularly so on certain days of every month, my desk is covered by thousands of these documents. If for any reason I am prevented from signing them regularly and promptly, the work of many clerks in the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, and in other divisions, is seriously delayed, to the detriment of the service and the inconvenience of the public. Since the passage of the present law the bulk of the work which falls upon the Secretary of the Treasury and upon the Assistant Secretaries has so greatly developed as to make it exceedingly difficult for an Assistant Secretary to regularly and promptly sign all these thousands of documents and still give personal attention to the proper and economical conduct of the work of the bureaus and divisions under his control. The work of the Secretary and of the Assistant Secretaries during the present administration has been exceedingly onerous by reason of the determined effort to effect changes and improvements in the direction of economy. What success has been so far attained is reflected in the estimates for 1911. Still further success is entirely within our reach along this line, and the passage of this proposed law will greatly assist in the attainment of the desired end.

Very truly, yours, CHARLES D. NORTON, Acting Secretary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill will entail no additional expense upon the Government. Its passage is strongly recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I know of no reason why it should not pass.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I am quite in sympathy with the gentleman's bill. I do not know whether it was the gentleman or the Treasury Department that prepared it, but it proposes to amend two sections of the Revised Statutes "so as to read as follows," and so forth. Which one of these sections will it be, or will it be both?

Mr. GOEBEL. It will be both.

Mr. KEIFER. Is there a repealing clause?

Mr. MANN. There is not. The gentleman provides that sections 246 and 247 be amended "so as to read as follows." There is only one section that follows. It ought to be so provided, as a matter of good form, otherwise you will find that when it goes into an act it will be sections 246 and 247. That may be possible; I have not seen it.

Mr. GOEBEL. I will move to strike out certain words.

Mr. MANN. Why not make it "that section 246 be amended to read as follows" and then repeal section 247?

Mr. GOEBEL. I will offer such an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes. I move to strike out the words "two hundred and forty-seven."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 3, page 1, the letter "s" at the end of the word "sections;" and strike out the words "and two hundred and forty-seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. It should have a clause repealing section 247.

Mr. GOEBEL. I move a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That section 247 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

COMPENSATION OF STOREKEEPERS.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 18813, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman authority of the committee?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes, sir.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18813) to amend section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stats., 567).

Be it enacted, etc., That section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stats., 567), be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 63. That storekeepers, storekeeper-gaugers, and gaugers, when traveling to or from assignments, or when transferred from one assignment to another, either in the same district or in different districts, shall receive the same compensation per day during the time necessarily occupied in traveling that they would be entitled to if on duty at the place to which assigned or transferred, or from which relieved, together with actual and necessary traveling expenses."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment of the section, as stated in the bill——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on this bill that it should be on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. Under the rules the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, it may only take a moment in committee; but I want to hear the gentleman's explanation before I consent.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BARTHOLDT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18813.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to amend section 63, so that it will apply to the revenue officers who are sent to look after the small distilleries. Under a construction of that section by the Comptroller of the Treasury, these officers were not allowed their per diem in traveling to and from the distilleries when assigned to duty, and their traveling expenses. A great majority of these were distilleries that consumed about 20 bushels and under a day, and were in districts remote; in many instances were very hard to get to, almost inaccessible; and when these men were sent on duty it was not infrequent that the owner of the distillery would shut down when they got there. In many instances it was found that these men incurred much larger expenses than their salaries came to; and for this purpose a recommendation of this amendment has been made, so that it would practically be for the benefit of the Government in collection of the revenue. It will affect about 500 employees. The increase will be something like $15 to each man annually, or a total expense of $7,500 a year. It is estimated that the revenues the Government would receive on account of the passage of the bill would be many times larger than this expense. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue estimates that it would save the Government at least $75,000 per year.

The revenue department of the Government has recommended this amendment of the statute heretofore, and it is earnestly insisting for the betterment of the service that the amendment be made now. For these reasons the amendment has been offered.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] permit me to suggest that he call the attention of the committee to the fact that this proposed amendment has been recommended by several Commissioners of Internal Revenue and also by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CULLOP. I desire to call attention to what one Commissioner of Internal Revenue has recommended on this subject:

TRAVELING EXPENSES AND PER DIEM FOR STOREKEEPERS AND STOREKEEPER-GAUGERS.

It is my duty to again call the attention of Congress not only to the desirability but the absolute necessity of so changing the law with respect to the traveling expenses of storekeepers and storekeeper-gaugers as to enable this office to allow such officer for per diem and traveling expenses, not only when going from one place of assignment to another place of assignment, but also when going from their homes or places where they are not under assignment to a place of assignment and returning therefrom.

Under the law as it stands and is construed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, who decline to allow and approve the per diem and expenses for the officers referred to under the circumstances described, not only great hardships are imposed upon them as well as actual injustice, but opportunity is afforded for the dishonest distiller to dictate in a great measure what officer shall not be assigned to his distillery, and is thus assisted in perpetrating frauds upon the revenue that can not be corrected as long as this condition exists. For instance, a small 3-bushel plant, operated by a dishonest man, gives notice of commencing operations. When the officer reports for duty, demand is made upon him for certain concessions in regard to the removal of a part of the product without payment of tax. If consent is not given the distiller gives notice that he will shut down, and in four days he closes out. The officer has probably received a per diem of $20, which is ten days' work at $2 per day. The little plant being in a wild, inaccessible mountain place, the officer has spent two or three days in getting there and incurred $5 expenses. If the distiller shuts down, he will incur a like expense to get back home, and instead of being benefited by the assignment, he is financially injured in accepting it, the result to him being a financial loss.

The Government also report that in instances of this kind they are many times unable to get competent men to go and serve in this capacity, and for this reason they are compelled to select men near the neighborhood in which the distillery is operated, and many times incompetent men are secured for the service for this reason. Hence this amendment is recommended.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of this bill is to increase in a way the compensation of these officers by allowing them certain traveling expenses which they do not now have?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; because the act which is sought to be amended here has been construed by the Comptroller of the Treasury to mean that they were not entitled to traveling expenses or per diem in going to and from a distillery.

Mr. MANN. That bill has been knocking around the doors of Congress for a number of years, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. No; not this bill. There was a measure before the Sixtieth Congress, but in different form. It was for an increase of the compensation of these employees.

Mr. MANN. It has been before a great many Congresses.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am the author of the bill for which this is a substitute. A similar bill was introduced by me in the Sixtieth Congress. In fact, it went further than this. That bill was reported favorably by a unanimous vote of the committee to which it was then referred.

Mr. MANN. What committee was that?

Mr. LANGLEY. The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had introduced the bill before that, had he not?

Mr. LANGLEY. I had not, but I would have done it if I had been a Member of Congress before that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is one of those peculiar and funny incidents to me that this Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department has finally got into action. For years we have been urging the so-called "expenditures committees" to go to work, in order that they might discover methods of saving money, of cutting off expenditures, of reducing salaries, of cutting down in the government service; and, lo and behold, after these years of agitation, this committee has gotten into action, and I notice that the gentlemen on this side of the House were cute enough, in sending in the first report in years from an expenditures committee, which is a report to increase pay, that they, with peculiar grins, are allowing the report to come from that side of the House and not from this. I have heard some gentlemen on that side of the House recently argue: "Oh, that these expenditure committees might have the power to send for witnesses, in order that we might get at the extravagances in the government service!" And the chairman of this particular committee, the other day on the floor of the House, told how they needed a clerk, in order that they might find these extravagances. But, lo and behold, we see how they find extravagance, and the extravagance is that the men are not paid enough; that they ought to have more money from the Treasury. And having no one on this side of the House who was bold enough to make such a report from this committee—this retrenchment committee—they have worked a confidence game on my friend from Indiana and gotten him to report the first bill to retrench expenditures by increasing pay.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois give an opinion upon the merits of this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question.

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will this encourage the bureau to transfer these men more frequently hereafter than they have been transferred heretofore, from one station to another?

Mr. CULLOP. No; it will not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman any estimate from the Treasury Department as to how much this will increase these expenditures?

Mr. CULLOP. The estimate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is that it will amount to an increase of about $7,500 a year in all.

Mr. TAWNEY. What compensation are these men receiving now?

Mr. CULLOP. Two dollars a day. This is not increasing their compensation.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is to give them compensation for the time consumed in traveling from one station to another and also to defray their traveling expenses?

Mr. CULLOP. That is all.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if all these gaugers are in the gentleman's district?

Mr. LANGLEY. We have our pro rata portion of them, I think.

Mr. MANN. Oh, much more than that. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to one point that I fear is not fully understood by some gentlemen, in view of their comments and inquiries. This is not a bill to raise anybody's salary. The existing law provides that the traveling expenses of storekeepers and storekeeper-gaugers, and their per diem while so traveling, shall be allowed, to quote the exact language of the statute, "when transferred from one distillery to another." I doubt whether it was the intent of Congress to confine this to travel in cases of a transfer, but the Comptroller of the Treasury has held otherwise. In construing this section, he said (1 Comp. Dec., 243):

That section, under the circumstances, should not be construed to authorize payment of compensation or reimbursement of expenses except under the circumstances therein specified, to wit, "when transferred from one distillery to another."

Mr. Chairman, to my mind there is absolutely no justification for this discrimination. These men, particularly those who are employed at small distilleries, are not paid enough per diem, because they really have a harder job than those at larger distilleries who get more, and I am not going to abandon the effort in their behalf even if I have to give it up temporarily. But I do not see how any gentleman can object to paying their expenses and per diem, while they are, in fact, on duty away from their homes, traveling in the service of the Government, and under orders, as other field employees of the Government are paid.

The purpose of this bill is to make the law uniform, so as to apply to all classes of internal-revenue employees alike, when on duty and traveling under orders.

Mr. TAWNEY. To what other places are they assigned?

Mr. LANGLEY. They can be assigned anywhere, within the law and regulations governing the service, but only those who are transferred from one distillery to another, after going on duty under an assignment, are paid their per diem and expenses. The purpose of the amendment is, as I have already said, to provide that, when they are assigned to a distillery or are relieved from duty, the per diem and traveling expenses shall be paid while traveling to or from the assignment, the same as in cases of transfer.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman means after his services have terminated?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; and also when going to the assignment. I have in mind one instance in which a gentleman wrote me a letter of thanks for getting him a temporary assignment as storekeeper-gauger. His expenses were $26, and he served ten days at $2 a day when the distillery closed down. He lost $6 net cash in the transaction and all his time in addition. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Did he thank you after the services were terminated or before?

Mr. LANGLEY. He thanked me before. His language afterwards was in a different strain. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, there is no doubt whatever in my mind as to the justice and advisability of this amendment. As I stated a while ago, and as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has stated, this legislation has been recommended repeatedly by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and it would be a simple act of justice to a class of employees who are underpaid and who, under the present law, are discriminated against in the matter of traveling expenses.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reference to this bill that it has had a very careful consideration by the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. We had before us the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and he fully recommended the passage of this bill. We did not go as far as the gentleman who introduced the bill wanted us to go; but we did think, and to that extent we ought to go, that it was just and fair to these employees to have their expenses paid while being transferred from one place to another.

Mr. TAWNEY. Right there I desire to say to the gentleman that if I understood the gentleman from Kentucky right that is not the purpose of this bill. The law now authorizes the payment of their expenses, or reimbursement of expenses, incurred, and also the payment for the time when they are transferred from one distillery to another, or one warehouse to another, while they are in the service. This bill is intended to cover the expenses prior to their entry upon the service in going from their home to the place where they have been appointed or assigned, and then to pay their expenses from the place where they have been employed back to their homes after the services are terminated. Under the ruling of the comptroller, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, they are now compensated for their time and reimbursed for their expenses entirely from one assignment to another assignment.

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes; but the original bill, as introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, provided an increase of pay also. We did not go as far as that.

Mr. TAWNEY. This bill is not to defray the expenses in going from one assignment to another assignment.

Mr. GOEBEL. I understand.

Mr. TAWNEY. But to pay the expenses in going from home to the initial assignment and returning to their homes at the termination of their service.

Mr. GOEBEL. I understand. We did not go as far as the gentleman wanted us to go.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] recall the painful experience which I had a short time ago in the House. I undertook to oppose the adoption of the resolution authorizing clerks for these committees on expenditures in the various departments, and, if I recall correctly, the gentleman from Illinois led the applause which came from that side of the House at the conclusion of the remarks submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. In fact, that was the only committee which asked for a clerk that had the effrontery to attempt any defense of the proposed action of the House in giving the clerks. I had suggested that if the committees were given power to subpœna witnesses, to have produced before them papers and persons, they could do some effective work.

The House provides now a force of committee stenographers, who can be called upon by any committee desiring to undertake investigations, so that the testimony may be reduced to writing; but in order to hold one or two hearings it seemed that all of these committees desired to have clerks, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] points out, the first effect of that action of the House is to have under consideration here a bill to provide additional expenditure in the Department of the Treasury. A reading of the report and the advocacy of this bill by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] has aroused a peculiar suspicion in my mind. In the report it is pointed out that if this bill be passed, the dishonest distiller who conducts, I suppose, a small still in some remote and inaccessible part of the mountain will no longer be able successfully to conduct his illicit traffic. That statement has aroused a peculiar suspicion in my mind and an overwhelming admiration for certain Representatives of the State of Kentucky, that in their official capacity they are now prepared to urge legislation which in their opinion will effectively stamp out illicit distilling in the State of Kentucky.

If I knew nothing else about this bill, I would feel convinced that the assertion of such an argument by the Representative from Kentucky was in itself sufficient to convince me I should not favor such a bill. Of course I do not pretend for a moment that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] is not as anxious as any other Member in this House to prevent frauds upon the Government by the operation of illicit stills, and yet, knowing the pride which these gentlemen take in their native Commonwealth and the anxiety they have to promote the home and well-known industries of the State, I am quite convinced they would do nothing which would in any way curtail the production of the beverage which "cheers but does not inebriate" in Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that if he would take one of these revenue jobs a little while down in the mountain sections of Kentucky he would undoubtedly be in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there would be no illicit stills left if he were on the job for any length of time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that there would be no difficulty if I had the appointment of gaugers and storekeeper-gaugers in his State, for in a short time there would be no need for any more of those employees, because the business would be conducted entirely within the law, and it would be possible to reduce expenditures rather than to increase them, while the places are filled as now by constituents from the gentleman's district.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The argument which the gentleman from New York is doing me the honor to say I have presented to the House is in fact an argument which has been presented by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did not he come from somewhere around Kentucky?

Mr. LANGLEY (continuing). And unanimously concurred in by the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman adopted the argument with such alacrity that I know he is envious of the brain which originated it. I have only to add that if these committees on expenditures in the various departments are to follow the example of this committee and to report legislation tending to increase the expenditures, that at least it is taking an unfair advantage of the President of the United States. He has pointed out the necessity for further economy at this time. The committees which have been at work in the past have so conducted their operations that the country is now facing a very great deficit. If after the exhortation of the President these committees, which are intended to curtail the expenses, to investigate and ascertain where expenditures have been made in ways not authorized by the appropriations, are to start to work, and instead of pointing out ways in which expenditures are to be reduced report legislation providing means to make easier the expenditure of public money, the President will be sadly overwhelmed at the end of a session of Congress which is controlled by members of his own party.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman, I think, with due deference to him, takes too narrow a view of the question of economy——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, if the gentleman will permit me right there, I believe that economy means curtailment, while the gentleman seems to have an idea that it is economy to increase expenditures. In that respect we differ.

Mr. LANGLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was endeavoring to call his attention to the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the enactment of this legislation would result in a saving of revenue which would in the aggregate amount to many times the slight increase in expenses. Hence I am advocating it as a measure of economy as well as of justice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, now the gentleman is an expert on this question; what is the capacity of a 3-bushel plant?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not claim to be an expert on this question. The gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. FITZGERALD. He may not know; I do not know what it is.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I do not recall just what the producing capacity per bushel is, nor what is required by the Government. I have never had any experience in the business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope, however, that this will be a lesson to that side of the House, that hereafter it will not take such pleasure in authorizing expenditures, but that it will watch closely even those committees which are supposed to curtail rather than increase the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, just for a moment, I will say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that this bill was introduced and advocated by a Republican, and is a Republican measure, and by the committee, a majority of whom are Republicans, I was directed to draw the amendment and to make the report. The report was unanimous for its passage.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman. The gentleman does not mean to say that this bill was introduced by anybody but the gentleman himself, I take it.

Mr. CULLOP. The original bill was introduced by a Republican, Mr. LANGLEY, of Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. Oh, a Republican may have introduced some other bill, but this bill, as shown on its face, was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. It was introduced as an amendment by the unanimous direction of the committee. Now, I deny that it will result in an increase in the expenditures of the Government, but will, on the contrary, largely increase its revenues, a thing much needed now. That is the purpose of it, and it is also estimated by the commissioner that the passage of this bill will secure to the Government the services of competent men, who will save ten times the amount of the extra cost it entails upon the Government, and that is the purpose for which the amendment is sought, and it is for that reason that the department has recommended the bill to the House and the committee has unanimously recommended its passage as amended.

If it will save to the people of this country $75,000 per year, as the Government claims, and only occasion an outlay of $7,500, I should think it will be in the interest of economy. It will enable the Government to collect that sum every year, which sum it now loses for the want of this amendment.

I will further say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that his party, and not mine, is on record for the increase of expenses, and that it is in the interest of economy that the Treasury Department recommends the passage of this amendment, and if, as he claims, this is an increase of expenses without an adequate increase of revenue in return, then the responsibility is with the head of the Treasury Department, which is Republican, and upon which source the responsibility must rest.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, has the bill been read for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been read for amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then the bill had better be read for amendment before we pass it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stats., p. 567), be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 63. That storekeepers, storekeeper-gaugers, and gaugers, when traveling to or from assignments, or when transferred from one assignment to another, either in the same district or in different districts, shall receive the same compensation per day during the time necessarily occupied in traveling that they would be entitled to if on duty at the place to which assigned or transferred, or from which relieved, together with actual and necessary traveling expenses."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I did not quite catch a moment ago, somebody having diverted my attention for the moment, what the gentleman from Indiana said as to how much this bill would cost the Government according to his estimate.

Mr. CULLOP. Seven thousand five hundred dollars a year will be the entire extra expense.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it will add anything to the efficiency of the service?

Mr. CULLOP. I think it will. I am satisfied of that, and that it will increase the revenues of the Government.

Mr. MANN. In what respect will it add to the efficiency of the service; are not these men efficient?

Mr. CULLOP. The commissioner says some of them are not, and it is impossible in those places to get efficient men, and that is why he has recommended it and recommended the passage of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky say that he can not supply a sufficient number of men to fill all these places?

Mr. CULLOP. The trouble with the gentleman from Kentucky is that all of the distilleries affected by this bill are not in Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. That would not trouble the gentleman; he would furnish gaugers for them all, whether in Kentucky or not. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, very peculiar just at this time, when we are urged to have economy, when the President is urging us and the departments not to increase the expenditures, when there is no estimate here, no request made for this expenditure, that Congress starts out in its talk of economy by passing a bill solely for the purpose of increasing the compensation of these gaugers.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will permit, I will answer that——

Mr. MANN. Doubtless it will be pleasant for them to receive more pay. That is true of all persons in the Government, beginning with the charwomen and ending with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. If there is any one of them who is not asking for an increase in pay, I have never had the pleasure of learning who that person was.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is not an officer of the Government. The gentleman has already increased his pay. [Laughter.] Now, here the cost is $7,500. Very well. Can any gentleman differentiate between this case and 10,000 other cases, 100,000 other officials? Not at all.

There is no more reason for increasing the pay of these men than there is for increasing the pay of other men in the government service. Who pays the bill in the end? Gentlemen simply can not undertake to pass measures only increasing the pay in $7,500 lots. When you get started you have got to take larger lots. I extremely regret that a proposition like this, endeavoring to force the Government to increase the pay of men now holding their offices under existing law, should come up urged and reported from that side of the House; and while I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] probably would not have been misled in making such a report if he had had longer service in the House, and is therefore excusable so far as he is concerned, that would not excuse the House for passing the bill which he recommends.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to say to the gentleman that I was not misled, unless the Internal-Revenue Commissioner made an erroneous statement to us.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that you can get a recommendation from every department of the Government to increase the pay of the men working in that department. What difference does that make? Congress has the responsibility of determining about these men and the pay. We do not act simply because the Secretary of this or the Secretary of that wants somebody under him paid a higher salary. That is solely the proposition.

Mr. LANGLEY. To pay salary is not the proposition.

Mr. MANN. I say it is a proposition to pay compensation, and it is a mere haggling of terms as to whether you call it traveling expenses or salaries. It is an increase of compensation. We have another proposition pending now before us, to double the pay of the library police—another harmless little proposition.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When did the gentleman reach his conviction as to the reduction of salaries? Since the increase of salaries at the last session of Congress? Did the gentleman advocate the increase of the President's salary from $50,000 to $75,000?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had been here he probably would have known that it was through the efforts of the gentleman from Illinois largely that the President's salary is not $100,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Did not the gentleman vote for a $6,000 automobile for the Speaker of this House? Also, did he not vote a like amount for the gentleman in the other House?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether I did or not. I know I will if I get a chance to do so. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] never hits the mark with a question. What earthly thing has that got to do with the question of increasing these salaries?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I rise simply for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois a question. I want to know if it is not a fact that the section men in the West get $2 a day for their services, and then transportation to and from their homes?

Mr. MANN. They do not in our part of the country, and we can furnish better section men than the gentleman has in his part of the country.

Mr. TAWNEY. I dispute that proposition.

Mr. MANN. We can not furnish as good Members of Congress, I will admit, but I think we can furnish as good section men.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending bill——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not expediting his bill by trying to cut off debate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). Or paragraph, or section, be closed in one minute, and that time be given to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he desires it.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that for his courtesy, almost insult, he will not expedite his bill in endeavoring to prevent gentlemen discussing provisions in this bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will say to the gentleman that I have not any bill.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his motion to close debate on the paragraph, for I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there are some of us on this side of the House who are not in favor of increasing salaries, and, further, that I will oppose all bills for that purpose until the revenues of the Government have reached a point where they are not exceeded by its expenditures.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, is a motion to close debate debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in one minute.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 21.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MACON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Is one minute not allowed for debate under the motion just adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. MACON. Then I would like to be recognized for that one minute. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I want to insist that it is highly improper to increase the compensation of these officials at this time and in this way. The committee that reported this bill was created for the purpose of investigating the expenditures of a certain department of the Government and report to the House whether or not they were extravagant, but I do not understand that it has the authority to bring in a bill increasing the expenditures of the Government at all. A few years ago salary increases were brought into the House upon appropriation bills, but a few of the Members have been watching those bills and making points of order against the increases, and hence they are not brought in upon them now. Therefore it seems that the policy concerning them has been changed, and an attempt is being made to have a committee that was created to investigate expenditures bring in bills increasing them. I hope the bill will not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on rising and reporting the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who made that motion?

Mr. CULLOP. I did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is that motion in order now, Mr. Chairman, debate having been closed?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from New York is not in order, according to previous decisions under Rule XXIII:

After the reading of the bill has been concluded the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the motion is not in order until the first paragraph has been read; and, as there is only one paragraph to this bill, let me suggest that under the rule cited by the Chair such a motion could be made. There is only one paragraph to this bill. The motion is not in order under the rule which the Chair has just read until that paragraph has been read. It having been read, the motion must be in order at this time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest that the paragraph has been read three several times.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was read once in the House and twice in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Clerk will read ruling 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend, and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection.

The CHAIRMAN. The case in which the ruling just stated was made was evidently a case where the committee had concluded consideration of amendments, because other motions had been entertained incompatible with amendments, but in this case it seems there may be other motions to amend made, and therefore the committee will have a chance to use the preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause. Under these circumstances the Chair therefore entertains the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say upon that motion that the gentleman from Illinois can not place the responsibility for extravagance on this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to inform the gentleman from New York that the ruling can not be debated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the motion to strike out the enacting clause is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has closed debate by a vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On the paragraph; but this is a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is simply a preferential motion to amend by striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I call the attention of the Chair to a ruling that the motion is debatable; and even if the previous question were ordered in the House, the motion would be debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair remembers, the motion was that debate should be concluded, within one minute, on the paragraph and amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion was to close debate on the paragraph which was read. This motion does not affect the paragraph at all. The enacting clause is not a part of the paragraph. It is separate and distinct from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] what his motion was?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that the Chair ask the Clerk what the motion was.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not remember distinctly, but my best recollection is that the motion was to close debate on the paragraph only, because no amendments had been offered up to that time that I know anything about. My recollection is that the motion was to close debate on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That inevitably closes debate on the amendments, because there has to be an amendment in order to have debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But this motion has never been considered as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this is an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is a motion which takes precedence of an amendment, but it is not an amendment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the nature of an amendment, and is governed by the five-minute rule, as other amendments are.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD), there were—ayes 34, noes 36.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARTHOLDT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18813) to amend section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stats., p. 567), and had directed him to report the same back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 60, noes 38.

Accordingly the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MACON) there were—ayes 40, noes 38.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. One moment. Will the gentleman kindly withhold his point?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will withhold it for a moment.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STUBGISS, for three days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 15387. An act authorizing the town of Bass Brook to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River, in Itasca County, Minn.;

H. R. 16223. An act extending the time for certain homesteaders to establish residence upon their lands; and

H. R. 13831. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. PRINCE, the Committee on Claims was discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 3788) for the relief of Horace C. Dale, administrator of the estate of Antoine Janis, sr., deceased, of Pine Ridge, S. Dak., and the same was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COMPENSATION OF STOREKEEPERS.

The House resumed consideration of the bill (S. 18813) to amend section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stat., 567).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the president of the Civil Service Commission, transmitting a statement of travel of officers and employees of the commission during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 598)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of proposed legislation affecting the expenses of the Osage Indian Agency (H. Doc. No. 597)—to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Kahului Harbor, island of Maui, Hawaii (H. Doc. No. 593)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for water supply, Fort Bayard, N. Mex. (H. Doc. No. 596)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation relating to certain bonds and certificates of indebtedness (H. Doc. No. 595)—to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments were, in line 6, page 1, before the word "use," to strike out "the" and insert "its;" and in the same line, after "use," to strike out the words "of the committee," so as to make the resolution read:

Senate resolution 155.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee during the Sixty-first Congress, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUE OF GEORGE L. SHOUP.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] on the 20th instant, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which was read, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 23.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Laird Shoup 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 shall be for use and distribution by the governor of Idaho; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed an engraving of said statue to accompany said proceedings, said engraving to be paid for out of the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to hear the language read again where it says, "to be bound in one volume."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That there be printed and bound in one volume.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that hardly expresses it. All will not be bound in one volume, but in separate volumes.

Mr. SMOOT. It follows the exact wording of all similar resolutions that have been passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. But they are not all to be bound in one volume.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what it says. It says the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue shall be bound in one volume.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. If it is limited to that, it is all right; but as I caught it, it did not seem to be so limited.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what it means. It follows the exact language of all similar resolutions that have been passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am only speaking of the matter of the form of language.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have that part of it read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8 strike out the word "governor" and insert in lieu the words "Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Idaho," at the end of line 8, strike out the remainder of the resolution and insert:

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable copper-process plate of the statue, to be bound with these memorials.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 156), which was referred to the Committee on Audit and Control of the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 156.

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee during the Sixty-first Congress, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. GORE. I offer a Senate resolution and ask for its present consideration.
The resolution (S. Res. 157) was read, as follows:

Senate resolution 157.

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative cost in the United States of transporting publications designated as "second-class mail matter" by mail, express, and fast freight.
Second. That the said committee be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid by the United States Government and by the express companies to the principal railroad companies in the United States for similar services in transporting publications designated as "second-class mail matter."
Third. That the committee be further directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative postal rates for transporting periodicals designated as "second-class mail matter" in the United States, in the Dominion of Canada, and other foreign countries.
Fourth. That the committee be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid to the leading railroad companies for transporting the several classes of mail by the Governments of the United States, Canada, Great Britain, France, and Germany in their respective jurisdictions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
Mr. KEAN. Is that a report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not. It is a resolution introduced with a request for its immediate consideration.
Mr. KEAN. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads here. Let the resolution be again read.
The Secretary again read the resolution.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
Mr. LODGE. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, whom I do not see in the Chamber, I think the resolution had better go over.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution will go over.

KOOTENAI RIVER BRIDGE, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are two bridge bills relating to Idaho which have been returned from the House with amendments. I ask that the bills be taken up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5040) to authorize Bonners Ferry bridge commission to construct a bridge across the Kootenai River at Bonners Ferry, Idaho, which was, on page 1, line 8, after the word "River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the amendment of the House be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

SNAKE RIVER BRIDGE, IDAHO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3318) to legalize a bridge across the Snake River between the States of Idaho and Oregon, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 2, on page 2, and to insert:

That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county court of Malheur County, in the State of Oregon, and the Ontario bridge commission to maintain and operate a bridge and approaches thereto now constructed across the Snake River at the town of Ontario, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That the said county court of Malheur County and the said Ontario bridge commission shall, within three months after the passage of this act, file with the Secretary of War their acceptance of this act, together with plans and specifications of the said bridge, and said plans and specifications shall have been approved by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers; otherwise, this act shall be null and void.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WATER RIGHTS IN IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 159), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 159.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a statement as to the water rights and power sites located and acquired on the public lands in Idaho for irrigation and power purposes, the date of location, the quantity of water claimed, and the streams on which locations have been made, and whether the water has actually been diverted under the location; also, the quantity of land withdrawn in Idaho from entry for irrigation and power purposes, and location of same.

TIMBER-LAND SELECTIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 158), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 158.

Whereas the act prohibiting selection of timber lands in lieu of lands in forest reserves (33 Stat. L., 1264) reserves the right of selection and validates contracts entered into by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the passage of the act referred to: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate what contracts were in force at the time of the enactment of the statute last referred to between the Secretary of the Interior or any other government official and any person, firm, or corporation who came within the saving clause of the statute aforesaid, and furnish copies of such contracts, together with a statement as to what, if any, of said contracts are now in force, what selections of indemnity lands have been made in the several States by any such persons, firms, or corporations, or by their grantees or assigns, giving the names of the selectors, the description of the lands and their location, the basis of each selection, and particularly in what reserves or withdrawals the basis for each selection was situated.

CONGRESS ON HYGIENE AND DEMOGRAPHY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) authorizing the postponement of the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography.

The amendments of the House were to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the invitation extended by the President of the United States to the Fourteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography, in accordance with the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the President to extend an invitation to the Twelfth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography to hold its thirteenth congress in the city of Washington," approved February 26, 1907, shall be modified and amended so that it shall provide for the holding of the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography at some place in the United States, to be selected by the President, in the year 1911 or 1912.

And to strike out the preamble.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS RIVER BRIDGE, KANSAS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4891) to extend the time for the commencement and completion of a railroad bridge across the Kansas River at or near Kansas City, Kans., in the County of Wyandotte, State of Kansas, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 3, page 2, and insert:

That the time for commencing and completing the bridge authorized by the act entitled "An act to authorize the Edgewater Connecting Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Kansas River at or near Kansas City, Kans., in the county of Wyandotte, State of Kansas," approved February 6, 1909, is hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval of this act.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 11307. An act to legalize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Hill City, Aitkin County, Minn.; and

H. R. 17743. An act to authorize Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across Current River.

H. R. 12315. An act to further regulate interstate and foreign commerce by prohibiting the transportation therein for immoral purposes of women and girls, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 17433. An act amending section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

H. R. 18586. An act amending sections 246 and 247, Revised Statutes.

H. R. 12438. An act to amend sections 7 and 8 of the act of May 29, 1908, entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 13410. An act to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War; and

H. J. Res. 101. Joint resolution authorizing an extension of the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad on the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

PUBLIC-LAND DECISION.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the document which I send to the desk may be printed in the RECORD and printed as a public document. It is a decision of the supreme court of the State of Idaho relative to the public lands, and is in line with matters now under consideration in this body. It contains a large number of citations of authority, and therefore I will not ask that it be read from the desk, as it would take some little time, but it will be valuable information for members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 328) and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the supreme court of the State of Idaho.

WILLIAM BALDERSTON, Plaintiff, v. JAMES H. BRADY ET AL., Defendants. } November term, 1909. Filed January 22, 1910. I. W. Hart, Clerk.

STATE LANDS—POWER OF STATE LAND BOARD—DISCRETION OF BOARD—TITLE TO SCHOOL LANDS—POWER OF BOARD TO RELINQUISH SCHOOL LANDS.

1. The state board of land commissioners is vested under the constitution (secs. 7 and 8, art. 9) with the "direction, control, and disposition of the public lands of the State, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

2. Under the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of article 9 of the constitution, the direction, control, and disposition of the public lands of the State must be in pursuance and under the direction of the constitution and statutes of the State and not otherwise.

3. Where the proposed or contemplated action of the state land board involves the exercise of judgment and discretion vested in the board, the courts will not attempt to control or direct such discretion or in any manner interfere with their action, so long as it is exercised within the scope of their authority. Where, on the other hand, the proposed or contemplated action is without the authority of law or has no legal sanction, the courts may interfere and interrupt their action and declare the law on the subject and point out to them the legal scope within which their judgment and discretion is to be exercised.

4. House joint resolution No. 10, adopted March 10, 1909 (1909 Session Laws, p. 451), has no force or effect as a law of the State and can furnish no authority or justification for the state board of land commissioners either acting or refusing to act on any matter coming before them. They can not rest or justify their action in any matter upon the authority or direction of such resolution or any action taken by the commission created by that resolution.

5. The state's title to sections 16 and 36 in every township in the State discussed and considered.

6. The state board of land commissioners has no power or authority conferred upon it, either by the constitution or statute of this State, to relinquish the State's right or title to sections 16 and 36, granted by the General Government for common school purposes, and any action taken by the board or under its direction or authority attempting to relinquish or waive the State's right to such lands is void.

Original action by the plaintiff to procure a writ of prohibition, restraining and prohibiting the state board of land commissioners from relinquishing the State's right and title to certain indemnity school lands. The defendant board demurred to the petition. Demurrer overruled.

Wyman & Wyman and B. S. Crow for plaintiff.

D. C. McDougall, attorney-general; J. H. Peterson, assistant attorney-general; Edwin Snow and Edwin McBee for the board; Gray & Knight, amici curiæ.

Ailshie, J.:

This is an original action commenced in this court by the plaintiff, as a citizen and taxpayer, praying for a writ of prohibition against the threatened action of the state board of land commissioners prohibiting and restraining them from relinquishing the right and title of the State of Idaho to certain lands situated in Shoshone County and heretofore selected by the board under the land grants made by the General Government to the State of Idaho. The board has filed a demurrer to the complaint, raising the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded. The facts pleaded, and on the sufficiency of which we must pass, are substantially as follows:

On July 6, 1901, the governor of the State applied to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the survey of a portion of the public domain in Shoshone County, and described as townships 44 north of ranges 2 and 3 east, Boise meridian. This application was made under the provisions of the act of Congress of August 18, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 372 and 394). Notice of the application was thereupon published in the Idaho State Tribune, of Wallace, as required by the act of Congress. Official survey was therefore made by the Government, and its approved plats were filed in the United States land office at Coeur d'Alene on July 5, 1905. It seems that the Commissioner of the Land Office neglected to give notice to the local land office at Coeur d'Alene city of the application made by the State. Between the date of the application made by the governor for the survey and the filing of the approved plats in the land office, a number of settlers went upon the lands and appear to have established their residence thereon. Under the act of Congress the State was given a priority of sixty days from the filing of the approved plats in the land office in which to select and make filing on any of the lands included in the survey. Accordingly the state board of land commissioners on July 9, 1905, offered filing lists at the Coeur d'Alene land office for a large portion of the survey, and the applications were refused on the ground that that office had no notice of the preference right of the State and that filings by settlers had previously been accepted. The filings of the State were accordingly rejected by the officers of the local land office. The State of Idaho appealed from the action of the local office to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The commissioner held that the State had a prior and preference right over all settlers who entered upon the lands subsequent to July 6, 1901, the date on which the governor applied for the survey of these townships. The settlers thereupon appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, and on June 27, 1907, Secretary Garfield rendered a decision affirming the action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and sustaining the prior right of the State to file upon the lands included in its lists. (See Thorpe et al. v. State of Idaho, 35 L. Dec., 640.) It appears that soon after the decision of the Secretary of the Interior the state board of land commissioners requested the Secretary to withhold final order and judgment affirming the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and directions to the local land office to receive the filings, and that accordingly the Secretary has withheld the final order and instructions from the department in the premises. This it appears, however, has been done solely on the request of the defendant board.

In the meanwhile, according to statements made in the briefs by counsel for the board, the matter crept into the political considerations in this State, and it seems that during the campaign preceding the general election of 1908 the two leading political parties made some promises or declarations that, if successful in the election, they would relinquish some of these lands to the settlers who had been unsuccessful in their contests before the department. In obedience, say the briefs, to those promises and representations the legislature, by house joint resolution No. 10, which passed the senate March 2, 1909 (1909 Sess. Laws, p. 451), adopted a resolution appointing a commission consisting of two members of the legislature and the state land commissioner, appointed by the governor, to investigate the claims of these settlers and to take testimony and report the same to the state board of land commissioners, together with their recommendations in the premises. It also provided that the state board of land commissioners should act upon the unanimous recommendations of the commission. Subdivision 11 of section 8 of the resolution provides as follows:

"Provided, That no recommendation shall be made unless with the approval of all members of the commission; and it is further provided that the detailed report of the commission, as required in section 3, be filed with the state board of land commissioners within thirty days after the completion of the investigation; and that the state board of land commissioners shall, within thirty days after the filing in their offices of the report and recommendations of the said commission, relinquish or cause to be relinquished all the rights of the State of Idaho to the lands claimed by said claimants, or such portion thereof as may be recommended to the favorable action of the state board of land commissioners."

The commission, acting under authority of this resolution, proceeded to the county where the lands are situated and took testimony, and thereafter made their findings and report and filed the same with the state board of land commissioners, recommending that certain tracts of land claimed by various settlers be relinquished, and that the State's filing thereon be canceled.

The complaint alleges that the board is about to, and threatens to, act in conformity with the recommendations of the commission and the provisions of the resolution and relinquish all the right, title, interest, and claim of the State in and to the lands described in the report and recommendations. It is to prevent this threatened action on the part of the board that the present suit is filed.

In support of the demurrer, the defendant contends that the board is vested by the constitution (sec. 7, art. 9) with unqualified power and authority over the lands granted by the United States to the State and is vested with unlimited discretion in the matter of selection of such lands, and may likewise, in its discretion, relinquish any such lands. Sections 7 and 8 of article 9 of the constitution provide as follows:

"SEC. 7. The governor, superintendent of public instruction, secretary of state, and attorney-general shall constitute the state board of land commissioners, who shall have the direction, control, and disposition of the public lands of the State, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law.

"SEC. 8. It shall be the duty of the state board of land commissioners to provide for the location, protection, sale or rental of all the lands heretofore, or which may hereafter be, granted to the State by the General Government, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and in such manner as will secure the maximum possible amount therefor: Provided, That no school lands shall be sold for less than $10 per acre. No law shall ever be passed by the legislature granting any privileges to persons who may have settled upon any such public lands subsequent to the survey thereof by the General Government by which the amount to be derived by the sale or other disposition of such lands shall be diminished, directly or indirectly. The legislature shall, at the earliest practicable period, provide by law that the general grants of land made by Congress to the State shall be judiciously located and carefully preserved and held in trust, subject to disposal at public auction for the use and benefit of the respective objects for which said grants of land were made, and the legislature shall provide for the sale of said lands from time to time and for the sale of timber on all state lands and for the faithful application of the proceeds thereof in accordance with the terms of said grants: Provided, That not to exceed 25 sections of school lands shall be sold in any one year, and to be sold in subdivisions of not to exceed 160 acres to any one individual, company, or corporation."

Now, there can be no question or doubt but that the "direction, control, and disposition of the public lands of the State" is vested in the state board of land commissioners. It is equally clear and certain that this power must be exercised "under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." Both of the foregoing sections of the constitution contain the same provision as to this limitation of power. The legislature is prohibited, however, from passing any law that would authorize a sale of school lands for less than $10 per acre or any sale or disposition other than "at public auction." In many of the matters coming before the board in reference to state lands they must exercise their judgment and discretion, and it is a well-settled principle of law that in such cases the courts will not attempt to control or supervise the discretion vested in the officers of a coordinate branch of the government. We held to the same effect in Pierson v. State Board of Land Commissioners (14 Idaho, 163). The findings of the board on the facts of any given matter of inquiry is final and conclusive. (White v. Whitcomb, 13 Idaho, 490; 29 Sup. Ct. Rep., 599.) But an error made in applying the law to the facts or an erroneous construction of the law by the land department may be reviewed and corrected by the courts. In Pierson v. Board, supra, this court said: "If they (the board) act in a matter without jurisdiction, there is a remedy; if they misapply the law to the fact found, or in case of fraud, there is a remedy * * *."

It is obvious that if the contemplated action of the board of land commissioners involves the exercise of a judgment or discretion vested in them by law, then this court can not and will not attempt to control that discretion or in any manner interfere with or direct the action of the board. If, on the other hand, the action proposed is without authority of law or has no legal sanction or authority, or is an attempt to act, not upon the discretion and judgment of the board, but upon a substituted judgment or discretion or upon the judgment, discretion, and direction of some other board or body, then and in such cases this court may interrupt them and declare the law on the subject, and point out to them the legal scope within which their judgment and discretion must be exercised.

It has been urged in this case, not by counsel for the State, but by associate counsel who are really representing the claimants to this land, that under the authority of Stein v. Morrison (9 Idaho, 426) the writ of prohibition will not lie against the governor or a board of which the governor is a member. The case cited falls far short of going to the length claimed for it by counsel. In that case the court, after stating the respective positions of counsel and the trend of the argument made on the subject, stated its legal conclusion as follows: "It seems to us that to keep within the principle of our constitution (sec. 1, art. 2) and form of government, which recognizes the independence and specific character of the 'three distinct departments' of government, that the judicial department could not attempt to prohibit either of the other departments from acting within the recognized scope of their respective branches of the government, but that, on the other hand, the legal effect of such action after it has been taken may be inquired into by the court." It will be observed that the test enunciated by the foregoing statement is that the action proposed to be taken must be "within the recognized scope of their respective branches of the government." It is doubtful if anyone would seriously contend that the process of the courts will not run against an individual or individuals, holding an executive office or offices or comprising an executive board, simply because they occupied such official position and were assuming to act as officials, although their action was beyond the scope of their authority and wholly unauthorized by law. We do not hold such a position tenable and have never so held.

It is also urged that the writ of prohibition will not run against the chief executive, and that since the governor is a member of the state board of land commissioners the writ will not lie against that board. This position is without merit. As stated in Stein v. Morrison, supra, it is held by many authorities that the writ of prohibition will not lie against the governor of the State to restrain him from performing an executive act. This case does not fall within the line of those authorities nor within the reason on which they rest. The state board of land commissioners is a constitutional body. It is composed of four members, each of whom has a vote on all matters coming before the board. This board is as distinct and separate from all other offices as is the office of governor or judge of this court. It is created by the same instrument which created the office of governor and the judicial department of the State. The individuals who compose the board and discharge its duties happen to be state officers, and it so happens that the governor of the State, by reason of being governor, is chairman of the board. When acting and voting at a meeting of the state board of land commissioners and discharging the particular and special duties devolving upon the board he is not acting as the chief executive, but, on the contrary, is acting as one of four members of a board in the discharge of certain ministerial and quasijudicial duties imposed on such board by the constitution and statutes. The writ, if issued, would run against the board and not against the governor.

Passing now to a consideration of the action of the legislature, we find that the joint resolution of March 2, 1909, under which this commission was appointed and the report has been made, is not a law of the State. It is not enacted in the manner provided for the enactment of a law (sec. 15, art. 3) and it is not contended that it is a law. On the other hand, it directs "that the state board of land commissioners shall, within thirty days after the filing in their offices of the report and recommendations of the said commission, relinquish or cause to be relinquished all the rights of the State of Idaho to the lands claimed by said claimants, or such portion thereof as may be recommended to the favorable action of the state board of land commissioners." This is not advisory or recommendatory, but is made mandatory. This resolution furnishes no authority of law for the action or direction of the state board, and the board can not act under it or rest any action or judgment or decision made by it upon the resolution. To do so would not be acting on the judgment and discretion of the board, but upon a substituted judgment, namely, that of the commission appointed by the resolution. If this were a legislative enactment in the form of a law, it would still be a serious question if the legislative department of the State could either authorize or direct the land board to part with the State's title and right to school or other lands for less than the constitutional minimum price or without a sale "at public auction."

It is contended that the board might discover that some of the land included in the lists filed is worthless, and that they might determine it wise to omit such land from the further lists and take other land instead thereof. That contention may be conceded, so far as this case is concerned, and still the admission will not answer the difficulty confronting us in this case. It is alleged by the complaint that the defendant board are threatening and proposing to act upon the report of the commission and in conformity with the resolution passed by the legislature and the investigation and report thereon, and are about to relinquish and surrender up the right and title of the State to this land. That allegation, necessarily admitted by the demurrer, takes the question of the discretion and judgment of the board out of the case and rests the action of the board entirely and solely upon this legislative resolution and the investigation and report had and made thereunder.

The constitution of this State was framed by the constitutional convention eleven months prior to the admission of the State into the Union, and it was ratified by the people some eight months before the admission. Notwithstanding this fact the people, at that early date, incorporated into the fundamental law of the State sections 7 and 8 of article 9 heretofore quoted, and thereby forbade the legislature authorizing any sale of land for less than $10 per acre or ever "granting any privileges to persons who may have settled upon any such public lands subsequent to the survey thereof by the General Government, by which the amount to be derived by the sale or other disposition of such lands be diminished, directly or indirectly." It was provided that the legislature should enact laws whereby the general grants of lands made by Congress to the State should be "judiciously located and carefully preserved and held in trust" for the several purposes and objects for which they were granted. The admission bill followed the provisions of the constitution, and by sections 8 and 11 thereof it is provided that none of the lands granted by Congress to the State should ever be sold for less than $10 per acre. It needs only to be called to mind to be at once apparent that the legislature can not authorize the land board or anyone else to do any act with reference to state lands that is forbidden by the constitution. Any gift of school or other state lands or relinquishment of the State's title is in violation of the fundamental laws of the State and would be void.

Another thing that should not be overlooked in this case is that the board must act "under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." The right of the State to this land has been adjudicated and determined by the Interior Department of the Government after a contest before that department covering a period of about nine years. The State has been pursuing its legal rights, and the issue has been determined by the duly constituted tribunal in favor of the State. No privity of interest existed between the State and these settlers. The State was not acting in its sovereign or governmental capacity, but purely in its proprietary and business capacity in acquiring title to property. In such capacity it could owe no duty to the citizen or settler except to keep within its legal rights and refrain from trespassing upon or interrupting any of the like rights of the settler. The Secretary of the Interior, the final arbiter in such matters, has found that the State was well within its rights and that the settlers had no rights in the premises. Now it is proposed to turn the land board, or the commission appointed under this resolution, into a kind of court of equity, and after a nine years' lawsuit and the expenditure of thousands of dollars to attorneys and agents for arguing and urging the State's claim at Washington, to reverse the judgment of the Interior Department and conclude that the State has for nine years been waging an unconscionable demand for a part of the public domain that rightfully belongs to settlers. The land board is not a court of equity; it is an executive board, charged with duties that must be executed in conformity with law.

Some such argument as is now made in support of the proposed action of the state land board was evidently made by the attorneys for the settlers before the Secretary of the Interior. The counsel for the State made reference to that fact in their brief, and said:

"There is all through the appellant's (the settlers) brief the assumption of some wrong done the settlers by the State. It is asserted that the grants to the State were 'in derogation of the common rights of the settlers,' 'must be strictly construed,' and that its selections in this case were in some way irregular or unfair. The officers who are representing the State in this matter feel, on the other hand, that in seeking to satisfy the grants for common school purposes, they are in the highest sense endeavoring to acquire this land as a heritage of the whole people. These very settlers who are appellants here will share in the benefits of the State's success." (35 L. Dec., 640.)

It was only after the subject had entered the domain of politics (as stated by the briefs) and political conventions had made promises and declarations in consideration for votes, that any different view appears to have been taken of this matter than that expressed in the State's brief before the Interior Department. The only thing in the way of carrying out this promise is that it would be a violation of the law. There is no statutory law to prevent political parties making all the promises they see fit to make, but whenever they undertake to carry out those promises by giving away the school lands, the heritage of the children of the State, the law steps in and forbids.

It has been urged on the oral argument in this case that at least a part of this land was selected as indemnity or lieu land instead of sections 16 and 36 in the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation. That question does not directly arise on the consideration of this demur, but since it is incidentally involved in the consideration of another phase of the case and will arise in the final determination of the case, we will give it consideration here. As has been heretofore observed in this opinion, the people of the State had adopted the constitution prior to the passage of the admission act. The act of July 3, 1890, admitting Idaho into the Union, specifically "accepted, ratified, and confirmed" the state constitution, and the State came into the Union immediately upon the passage and approval of the admission bill. Nothing remained for the State to do to bring itself within the provisions of the act of admission. It was then a State.

Sections 4 and 5 of the admission bill provide as follows:

"SEC. 4. That sections Nos. 16 and 36 in every township of said State, and where such sections or any parts thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one-quarter section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said State in such manner as the legislature may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

"SEC. 5. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only shall be expended in the support of said schools. But said lands may, under such regulations as the legislature shall prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than five years, and such lands shall not be subject to preemption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only."

It will be observed that the language of this grant is in præsenti. The grant would therefore seem to be a present grant. The act says that sections "16 and 36 in every township of said State * * * are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools." It also provides for the selection by the State of "indemnity lands" to reimburse the State "where such sections or any parts thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress." This evidently had reference to the time of the passage of the act, and meant that lieu or "indemnity lands" might be selected for such lands as had been sold or disposed of at the time of the admission of the State. This is accentuated by the provisions of the latter part of section 5, saying that no such lands, "whether surveyed or unsurveyed," shall be "subject to preemption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States." This act, it will be observed, is different from most of the previous land laws as well as land grants, in that it specified and included "unsurveyed" lands, and thereby withdrew all the "unsurveyed" sections 16 and 36 from settlement or "entry under the land laws."

Section 13 of the admission bill specifically provided against the contingency which arose in the Nevada admission bill (13 Stat. L., 30) as construed in Heydenfelt v. Daney G. & S. M. Co. (93 U. S., 634). That section provides that all mineral lands shall be exempt from the grants made by the admission bill and authorizes the State to make selections of lieu land for sections 16 and 36 wherever such sections might be lost to the State by reason of being mineral lands. The Nevada admission bill contained no such exemption or reservation. The chief reason, however, given by the court for the decision in the Nevada case does not exist or apply here, for the reason that many of the sections numbered 16 and 36 in Idaho had been "sold or otherwise disposed of" prior to the admission of the State. It may be further noted that section 14 of the admission bill negatives the idea of the necessity for a selection of sections 16 and 36 and of the Secretary of the Interior having any control or direction whatever over such sections. His authority and direction are confined by that section to "lands granted in quantity or as indemnity" lands.

It seems to be intimated that the admission bill was in some way amended and modified by act of August 18, 1894, and other amendments to the land laws (28 Stat., 372, 394), but we know of no power or authority whereby the Congress can divest the State of its title to lands that have been previously granted and to which title has vested.

It is not improper to note another significant fact in this connection. On February 22, 1889, which was about a year and a half prior to the admission of Idaho, Congress passed an act (25 Stat. L., 679) authorizing the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and state governments and providing that they might thereafter be admitted as States. That act, by section 10 thereof, provided that the new States should, upon their admission into the Union, receive sections 16 and 36 in every township for common-school purposes. That same section, however, contained a proviso that is nowhere to be found in the Idaho admission bill. That proviso specifically excepts and reserves from the operation of the act sections 16 and 36 "in permanent reservations for national purposes" and "any lands embraced in Indian, military, or any reservations of any character." It is significant that the Idaho admission bill, passed subsequent to the passage of the foregoing act, contained no such exception or reservation. There is nothing in the entire admission bill which negatives the idea of a present grant. The grantee was in existence at the time of the passage of the act, and the lands were in the State, some surveyed and others unsurveyed. The fact, however, that the land was not surveyed could make no difference where the numbers of the sections were specifically given. The title to unsurveyed lands may be as readily conveyed as that to surveyed lands. It is a maxim of law that that is certain which is capable of being made certain. (Id certum est, quad certum reddi potest.) All that remained to be done in order to identify these lands on the ground was to have the survey extended over them. The description in the grant was definite and certain. So far as we are aware it has been the uniform holding of the Supreme Court of the United States that such grants are grants in præsenti, and immediately vest title in the grantee. The principal, if not the only, exceptions to this rule are Heydenfelt v. Daney G. & S. M. Co., supra; Hall v. Russell (101 U. S., 503); and Rice v. Minn. & N. W. R. Co. (66 U. S., 358, 17 L. Ed., 147). The Heydenfelt case, so far as we can find, has never been referred to by the Supreme Court but once (N. Y. Indians v. U. S., 170 U. S., 18), and it was there mentioned as one of the rare exceptions to the general rule in construing land grants. The cases to the contrary are too numerous to attempt to collate them all. (See Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall.,

A holding that the State, hampered as it always is in such matters, was intended to run a race with settlers, land-scrip brokers, railroad companies, and timber and stone land grabbers to secure the remnant and refuse of the public domain as lieu and indemnity lands for all its best and most valuable school land sections—16 and 36—would render sections 4 and 5 of the admission bill only a delusion and an idle declaration. At the time of the admission of the State into the Union, less than one-fifth of the area of the State had been surveyed. There remained about 44,000,000 acres to survey. If title vested in the State to the school sections only that had been surveyed, the State was getting merely the barest contingency for the unsurveyed sections, notwithstanding the declaration in the act that "whether surveyed or unsurveyed" such lands should not be subject to any kind of entry.

This discussion, however, is collateral and incidental only to the main point with which we are here interested. Whether the Government, through any of its agencies, has the power to reclaim the school sections granted by the admission bill is immaterial so far as the Government is concerned, because Congress by the act of August 18, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 372), and other acts dealing with the public domain has amply authorized the Interior Department to grant indemnity and lieu lands to the States for any and all lands lost or relinquished by the State. (Opinion of Attorney-General of Sept. 15, 1909; decision Secretary of the Interior in Heirs of Irwin v. Ewing and State of Idaho, filed subsequent to Sept. 15, 1909, and not yet officially reported.) The real question then recurs: Has the State authorized the relinquishment of sections 16 and 36, and has the state land board the authority to relinquish the State's right to such lands? But one answer can be given to this query. The authority for such an act can not be found in either the Constitution or statute. It is, therefore, perfectly safe to say that no such power exists. We have hereinbefore said that the board must act under the law. It must find authority in the Constitution and statute for its acts. No such authority as claimed exists, and it is clear that the state land board has no power to relinquish or surrender the right or title of the State of Idaho to any of its school lands. If the State's title to any of these lands, comprising sections 16 and 36, is questioned or denied by the department, then the duty of the State to secure an adjudication of the matter by the Federal Supreme Court is plain and unmistakable.

It follows, therefore, that whatever may be said with reference to the State's vested rights in sections 16 and 36, it is plain that where such sections are found to be mineral lands the State's title fails by reason of such fact, and the land board are authorized, and, indeed, it is their duty, to make indemnity selections from other lands to reimburse the State for the loss. If the state agent, in making the filing, should err in describing the lands lost, sold, or disposed of for which the lieu-land selection is being made, we do not apprehend such an error would defeat the State's right to make the selection and acquire the title to such land and have them properly charged against such lands as it had actually lost by reason of the mineral character of school sections or by reason of loss to the State of any of its public grants from any other legal cause.

The complaint states a cause of action, and the demur will be overruled. It is well enough to suggest at this time that the action of the commission appointed by the joint resolution of the legislature has no place in the consideration and decision of the land board and can furnish no protection or justification for any action by the board, and no evidence on that subject would be admissible or considered in this case. Neither will evidence as to the condition of these lands or the bona fides of the settlers be considered. Their claim has been one against the United States, and they must wage that claim against the General Government and not against the State. The State has acquired whatever right, title, or claim it now has to the lands freed of any and all claims of the settlers.

REGULATION OF FEDERAL COURT PRACTICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 3724) regulating injunctions and the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the objection of the Senator from North Carolina, the bill goes over.

ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The bill (S. 183) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Rosebud Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read, but there are amendments reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KEAN. Is this the bill containing an appropriation of $415,000?

Mr. GAMBLE. No; this is not the bill which was under consideration on two occasions at the present session. This is another bill, but I do not understand that it has been read. The bill to which the Senator from New Jersey calls attention was read, but this bill has not been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota is correct in his statement. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 1, page 1, line 7, after the word "point," to strike out "on the state line between the States of South Dakota and Nebraska where range line 25 west of the sixth principal meridian intersects the same, thence running west on said state line to a point where the range line between ranges 26 and 27 intersect the said state line, thence north on said range line between ranges 26 and 27 to a point where the same intersects the tenth standard parallel north, thence west on said tenth standard parallel north to a point where the same intersects the western boundary line of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, thence north on the western boundary line of the Rosebud Indian Reservation to a point in the center of the main channel of the White River, thence easterly along the center of the main channel of said White River to a point where range line 25 west of the sixth principal meridian intersects the same, thence south on said range line 25 west of the sixth principal meridian," and insert "on the third guide meridian, west, where the township line between townships 39 and 40 intersects the same; thence running west on said township line to a point where the same intersects the boundary line between the Rosebud and Pine Ridge Indian reservations; thence north on the boundary line between said reservations to a point where the same intersects the center of the main channel of the White River; thence in an easterly direction along the center of the main channel of said White River to a point where the third guide meridian, west, intersects the same; thence south on said third guide meridian, west," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell and dispose of all that portion of the Rosebud Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota lying and being within the following described boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point on the third guide meridian, west, where the township line between townships 39 and 40 intersects the same; thence running west on said township line to a point where the same intersects the boundary line between the Rosebud and Pine Ridge Indian reservations; thence north on the boundary line between said reservations to a point where the same intersects the center of the main channel of the White River; thence in an easterly direction along the center of the main channel of said White River to a point where the third guide meridian, west, intersects the same; thence south on said third guide meridian, west, to the place of beginning, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 5, line 6, after the word "the," to strike out "Indian Bureau" and insert "Interior Department;" in line 11, after the word "empowered," to insert "to select such clerks and assistants at such compensation;" in line 16, after the word "within," to strike out "each" and insert "that portion of said;" in line 22, before the word "land," to insert "and timber;" in the same line, after the word "appraised," to insert "Provided, That the timber lands shall be classified without regard to acreage: And provided further, That all land classified as timber lands shall be reserved for the use of the Rosebud Indians;" and on page 6, after the word "expenses," at the end of line 3, to insert "exclusive of subsistence," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the price of said lands entered as homesteads, under the provisions of this act shall be fixed by appraisement as herein provided. The President of the United States shall appoint a commission to consist of three persons to inspect, appraise, and value all of said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians, or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior or otherwise disposed of, and excepting sections 16 and 36 in each of said townships, said commission to be constituted as follows: One resident citizen of the State of South Dakota, one representative of the Interior Department, and one person holding tribal relations with said tribe of Indians. That within twenty days after their appointment the said commissioners shall meet and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. The said commission is hereby empowered to select such clerks and assistants at such compensation as the Secretary of the Interior may approve. The said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect, classify, and appraise, in 160-acre tracts each, all of the remaining lands embraced within that portion of said reservation as described in section 1 of this act. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timber land; fifth, mineral land, if any, the mineral and timber land not to be appraised: Provided, That the timber lands shall be classified without regard to acreage: And provided further, That all land classified as timber lands shall be reserved for the use of the Rosebud Indians. That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands, and necessary expenses, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; such inspection and classification to be completed within six months from the date of organization of said commission. That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of all of said lands the same shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 20, after the word "prescribe," to insert "and patents therefor shall be issued to the purchasers," so as to read:

And it is further provided, That any lands remaining unsold after said lands have been open to entry for seven years may be sold to the highest bidder for cash without regard to the prescribed price thereof fixed under the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and patents therefor shall be issued to the purchasers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 8, line 3, after the words "Revised Statutes," to insert "and he is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in any town site, and to issue patents for such reserved tracts to the municipality legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause not more than 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in aiding the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements in the town sites in which such lots are located;" and in line 14, after the word "lands," to insert "less the amount set aside to aid in the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reserve from said lands such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and he may cause the same to be surveyed into blocks and lots and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe, in accordance with section 2381 of the United States Revised Statutes; and he is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in any town site, and to issue patents for such reserved tracts to the municipality legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause not more than 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in aiding the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements in the town sites in which such lots are located. The net proceeds derived from the sale of such lands, less the amount set aside to aid in the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements, shall be credited to the Indians as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 9, line 8, before the word "cents," to strike out "one dollar and twenty-five" and insert "two dollars and fifty;" in line 14, after the word "not," to strike out "occupied" and insert "otherwise appropriated;" and in line 19, after the word "settlement," to insert the following proviso.

Provided further, That in any event not more than two sections shall be granted to the State in any one township, and lands must be selected in lieu of sections 16 or 36, or any part thereof, within the township in which the loss occurs.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That sections 16 and 36 of the land in each township within the tract described in section 1 of this act shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $2.50 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the State of South Dakota for such purpose, and in case any of said sections, or parts thereof, are lost to said State by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized, within the area described in section 1 of this act, to locate other lands not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding two sections in any one township, which shall be paid for by the United States as herein provided, in quantity equal to the loss, and such selections shall be made prior to the opening of such lands to settlement: Provided further, That in any event not more than two sections shall be granted to the State in any one township, and lands must be selected in lieu of sections 16 or 36, or any part thereof, within the township in which the loss occurs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 10, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "one hundred and twenty-five;" and in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-five," so as to read:

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of not more than $125,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of South Dakota, as provided in section 7 of this act. And there is hereby appropriated the further sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making the appraisement and classification and allotments provided for herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 3, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That the lands allotted, those retained or reserved, and the surplus lands sold, set aside for town-site purposes, or granted to the State, or otherwise disposed of, shall be subject for a period of twenty-five years to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to section 2 of the bill. I hope the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] will accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the close of section 2 the following words:

Provided, That applicants to enter said lands shall be allowed to forward their applications by registered mail to the authorities of the local land office under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from South Dakota will find himself in a situation to accept this amendment. I offer it for this reason: I know something of these openings, especially when lands are opened by lottery. I went to Oklahoma during one of these lotteries. If everybody who attended the drawing should be successful, of course there would be no complaint; but from 10 to 20 people are compelled to attend to every one who is successful in the lottery. It is a great and unnecessary inconvenience, and besides it is an enormous expense; it subserves no public purpose; and it practically disqualifies everybody who is not able to make the trip to the local land office. For this reason, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, a different method of land openings has been adopted during recent years, requiring registration at adjacent points to the lands to be opened. This bill follows the usual course in all the land-opening bills. The lands are to be opened by proclamation of the President under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. It is the judgment of the department that this manner of opening is wise and safe; that it leads to good results, and avoids the difficulties, the dangers, and the violent acts that have heretofore occurred in land openings without these restrictions.

I doubt whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] would bring any desirable result. If applications could be filed by registered mail at local land offices, the land office would be simply overwhelmed by applications from all over the United States; they would be limitless and put a burden upon the department that it seems to me would be unnecessary. Of course I should be glad to comply with the Senator's wishes, but as these rules have been adopted, have been followed, and have worked well, I do not believe it would be wise to hastily invade the regular procedure by adopting such a proposition without consideration at this time. I therefore do not feel that I ought to accept the amendment.

Mr. GORE rose.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] for more than a few moments in anything that he may have to say on this subject, but I do want to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] to the spectacle that we had out there with reference to the opening of some other reservations. I think it has been called to his attenion how undesirable and how unsatisfactory the methods have been which have been recently followed. I do not know that we can add anything to this bill; I am not certain that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, if added, would relieve the situation; but I am very well satisfied that there ought not to be any more land openings following the methods which have been pursued in our section of the country on the last two or three occasions.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I might call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] to the last land opening we had in our State. That was the opening of the lands of the Cheyenne and Standing Rock Indian reservations. I do not recall just exactly the acreage to be opened, but at least, including the Indian allotments, it aggregated something like 3,000,000 acres. We have had some experience, Mr. President, in the manner of these openings in that section of the country. There were about 80,000, I think, who registered, and I believe there were but ten to twelve thousand quarter sections of land to be filed upon. The first experience we had in our State following the one I think in Oklahoma, was at the opening of the lands in Gregory County. I think between four and five hundred thousand acres were to be opened. Something like 107,000 people registered, and only a limited number of homesteads were available. Following that an opening was had in Tripp County, adjacent to these lands, and although in proportion the lands were very much greater in acreage than in the prior opening, there were a very limited number in comparison who registered. Then, in the case to which I have referred, the Cheyenne and Standing Rock, the number was still less. So that I doubt the efficacy of the remedy proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] would take the matter up with the President and the Secretary of the Interior, I think that would be the better policy to be followed.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I am not going to reiterate here the inconveniences to those who go to make these registrations; in fact, I have never had so much concern about them or as to how many have gone to attend them, in proportion to the number who draw prizes. But there is the other phase of it, and that is requiring them to go a long distance to register. I have no doubt that prevents a large number of people from undertaking to get homesteads who are most entitled to have them. I recall that during the last registration I was frequently on the trains in that portion of the State—and, if I remember rightly, I met the Senator up in that section on one occasion—when they were running trains in five, six, seven, and eight sections every day. There were estimated to be 5,000 people sleeping on the ground in one of the little towns where the registration was going on. It was impossible for any person getting on a train along the line within a hundred miles of one of those registration places to get a seat in a car.

That inconvenience, of course, argues nothing with reference to the merits of the system or otherwise; but here is the difficulty, it seems to me, and here is the thing that is against it: It is only the man who can afford to make the trip out there and pay his expenses who has any chance to get the land. I will say I was in that part of the State every day for a week riding on those trains, my engagements happening to put me just in that part of the State at that time. I talked with those people, and, in my judgment offhand, two-thirds of them were going up there more as a lark than anything else. There were people on their vacations going up to see what was done at a land opening. I know personally that some of them who drew very low numbers—within the first twenty—who did not even go and settle on the land. They did not care that much about it. In short, the people who really ought to have that land as homesteads, under the present registration system, can not go there and get it, as the chances are too small of their getting it to warrant them, with their limited means, in putting out the money to cover the expense.

The person who wants to take a vacation, the person who wants simply to go on a lark, the person who wants to spend a little money, will go there, it does not make any difference if his chance is only one in ten thousand; but the person who wants a homestead, with whom every dollar counts, and who does not want to take that risk without some fair and legitimate expectation or opportunity of winning, will not go out there. In short, it throws the few people who really need homesteads, who want homesteads, who ought to have homesteads, and for whom the homestead law was made and who do go, in competition with about ten times as many people who have no use for homesteads and who are really almost afraid they will draw homesteads when they go out there and make the registration. There ought to be some way devised by which they would not have to come in competition. For example——

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURKETT. Let me finish this sentence and then the Senator can have the floor.

I have in mind a bank clerk who lived in a very nice little town in Iowa. That bank clerk was on a vacation and wanted to go somewhere. So he went out there, and drew within the first twenty. He did not want that homestead; he never intended to go out there and make a home, and never would have gone out there; yet, as I have said, he drew within the first twenty. Of course he sold his relinquishment. There were a great many more just like that man, as we know. There was somebody out there who ought to have had that homestead, but, as a matter of fact, by his going, and under that registration system, somebody else who ought to have had it did not get it, and there were many more at home who ought to have gone there who did not go because the expense was too great.

Mr. President, I am just about through. As I have said, I do not know whether the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma reaches the case. Before we vote on it I am going to have it read again and, as I understand, the Senator from Oklahoma is going to explain it more at length. I have, however, not any manner of doubt but that of all the different ways that have ever been conceived for opening up reservations, the methods and practices that have been followed within the last two, three, or four years are the most vicious of any that have ever been tried. In my judgment, the old rush system that they had out in Oklahoma was much better than this system. It at least gave every man a chance in physical endurance, and he won if he had physical endurance and physical prowess. The present system does not insure anybody even a chance who really ought to have a homestead. I think, as I have said, it is the most vicious system that has ever been conceived.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in connection with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] I would make this statement: The notary fees in the opening of a reservation during this last year in my immediate section of the country, I am told, amounted to more than $40,000. Every person that registered had to pay a notary fee. That was unfair to those people. Only those whose names are drawn should be required to pay the notary fee. They should be entitled to register, and when the names are drawn, those to whom the land goes should make the declaration then and there and pay the notary fee. There is no sense on earth in having 180,000 people pay notary fees when they are only going to get one chance in eighteen. I merely make the suggestion for what it is worth.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senate unduly, but in reply to what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has stated in regard to the recent opening of the Cheyenne and Standing Rock Indian reservations. I have to say that there were four or five different registration points in the State adjacent to the land to be opened. It was necessary that those who intended to file should go there and register, and, of course, in registering they had to show that they would be competent to file upon the land.

An affidavit has to be made and 25 cents notary fee is charged. This latter statement is in reply to the statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Trains were run, accommodations were provided at all of those points, and no 3,000 or 5,000 or any other number of men or women were obliged to sleep out of doors. Registration booths were kept open all night to accommodate all comers. They could come and go at any time of the day or night.

Perhaps this system, Mr. President, is not the best system; perhaps some other and better system can be devised, but this has grown up as a result of what was known as the "sooner rushing," I think, down in Oklahoma and at other places; that is to say, the one who first got upon the land was entitled to file, and there was trouble; there were contests; there was loss of life. In addition to that, it involved the Interior Department in endless litigation and controversy in the establishment of title. So the present system was adopted to avoid the trouble, delay, danger, and expense; and I do not believe that it would be bettered by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

In reply further to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that the men and women who are entitled to file upon the land are precluded, I will say that only a limited outlay is required to show their good faith in making the filings and to show that they are entitled to homesteads. If the registration is thrown open to every citizen of the United States, a limitless number of applications would be filed, and the department would not know whether they were filed in good faith or otherwise. It seems to me it would entirely destroy any possibility of a successful opening and the bringing to those lands of desirable settlers.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not care to speak especially to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], but at this time I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I conceive to be two very serious defects in this bill. I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I raised these objections in the committee and reserved my right to make them on the floor of the Senate.

This bill provides, Mr. President, that the Government shall pay for the opening of this Indian reservation. This bill, together with its companion bill, appropriates something like a quarter of a million dollars of the public funds. I contend, sir, as was contended in the Senate recently by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that the enabling act between the State of South Dakota and the Government of the United States does not provide, by any fair interpretation of that act or by any interpretation that might be placed upon it by a lawyer who has studied it and given the subject careful consideration, that the Government shall be burdened with this expense. I grant you, sir, that in many instances this practice has grown up in the opening of western lands, but not because the enabling act between those States and the Government provides for it. For one, sir, I am not willing that this bill shall become a law without raising my voice and entering my solemn protest against the Government being called upon to pay the expense of opening this Indian reservation.

Take the enabling act. I call upon the Senator from South Dakota to point out to the Senate the specific clause, to point to the letter of the law, that authorizes the taking of money from the Public Treasury before you shall enter there and use it for private purposes.

Now, sir, there is another very serious defect in this bill. Section 7 provides:

SEC. 7. That sections 16 and 36 of the land in each township within the tract described in section 1 of this act shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $2.50 per acre.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if the Government now owns sections 16 and 36? I wait for an answer.

Mr. GAMBLE. The Indians possess the right of occupancy, and, under the law and legislation of Congress, the Government agreed to reserve these lands and to pay for them, not only by law, but under the enabling act admitting the State of South Dakota to the Federal Union.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the Senator from South Dakota if the title of sections 16 and 36 is not in the Indians by the terms of the treaty?

Mr. GAMBLE. The right of possession, I presume, is.

Mr. DAVIS. I maintain, Mr. President, that not only the right of possession, but the absolute fee to these lands is to-day in the Indians of South Dakota, where this reservation is proposed to be opened.

Now, sir, the serious objection I raise to this bill is that it provides that the Government shall buy, or that there shall be reserved out of this reservation, sections 16 and 36 for the use of the common-school fund of South Dakota. I am the last man on earth who would raise his voice inimical to the school interest of any State. But, sir, I maintain, with the admission of the Senator from South Dakota, that the Indians own not only, as I say, the right of possession, but the absolute fee to these lands, and for the Government to say that lands which it does not own shall be reserved for common-school purposes is an absolute fraud and a subterfuge; and the further reading of the bill discloses that if these lands are already taken, are already occupied, or have already been entered, then, sir, the provision in the bill is that the school land shall be shifted to other unallotted land.

Ah, sir, I am told that these other unallotted lands are absolutely worthless, absolutely valueless, and the purpose of this bill, as I see it, is to force the Government to pay $2.50 per acre for this worthless arid land. By whom it is backed I know not. The Senator from South Dakota knows not. I clear him of any sort of imputation. But, sir, there must be behind this some powerful and potent force that would suggest that the Government buy these worthless, arid lands and pay $2.50 an acre for them and appropriate from the Public Treasury of the United States a quarter of a million dollars in order to do it.

Mr. President, too many scandals have arisen recently with regard to land grabbing in the great Northwest. The history of all that is known to all the Senate. I call upon Senators here, before they invade the Treasury and take from it this large sum of money, to act cautiously, to act prudently, and to see where they are before they vote away the people's money.

Mr. President, I have said this much because I thought it was my duty to raise my voice against what I believe to be an iniquitous bill, one fraught with much evil, couched, as all such things are couched, under the pretense of the good of the people.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, this bill was introduced by my colleague, and he is in charge of it, but it is one of interest to my State, and I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] has great concern over imaginary dangers. I have lived in the West all my life, and I have lived in South Dakota half of my life. It was a Territory when I went there, and almost all of the west half of it was an Indian reservation, occupied by the Sioux Indians.

By treaties negotiated from time to time, and by laws enacted from time to time, the area of lands occupied by the Indians has gradually narrowed to smaller and smaller limits, until now the lands owned by the Indians are comparatively small in quantity. They are not lands which in their possession bring any revenue whatever. They do not cultivate them. There is neither fish nor game upon them. The policy of the Government toward the Indians and toward these lands has changed in more recent years simply in this respect—that the lands be sold and the proceeds made into a trust fund, the principal forever held inviolate and the income from which is devoted to the Indians.

When these lands under this bill and similar bills are thrown open to settlement, the Indian first selects by allotment the portion he is allowed to take upon the abandonment of his tribal relations, and the balance is sold to the settler, who must first make entry and settlement and comply with the provisions of the law and then pay the Government, and the proceeds go into the fund for the Indians.

Sections 16 and 36, to which the Senator refers, are held from the settler and are given to the State to keep good the pledge made to the State by the Government under the enabling act when the State was admitted into the Union, by which a grant was made to the State for its common schools of sections 16 and 36, whether surveyed or unsurveyed. Our State came into the Union with that grant and that provision in its organic law, and the pledge of the Government in the enabling act was given to the State that it would receive sections 16 and 36 for the benefit of its common schools. So sections 16 and 36 can not in the remotest degree be charged with being a subject for jobbery or speculation or graft, because they are the property of the State, granted for the support of its common schools, and this provision is simply to enable the Government to keep that pledge.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I know, had a worthy object in view when he proposed this amendment, but it seems to me it will utterly fail to remedy the trouble which the Senator seeks to correct. It is true that when these proclamations are issued opening lands in the West, under the method that is pursued now, great crowds get on the trains and go long distances, and many of them spend their money, and certain abuses have followed that method. But how would the mere mailing of a registered letter to the representative of the Government on the ground make this matter any better? It seems to me it would make it infinitely worse.

The whole object now—and it is a worthy object, indeed—is that these lands shall be secured to the actual settler, the man who wants them for a permanent home, the man who wants them for his family. But if you give to every person who mails a registered letter to the superintendent in charge of these openings a right to secure a number and have it registered and drawn in the lottery, instead of having 150,000 persons on the ground drawing numbers you will have perhaps 15,000,000 who had simply paid the expense of registration and mailed a request to be permitted to file, accompanied by some affidavit containing whatever was required; and every person everywhere, no matter whether he was intending to be an actual settler or not, whether his motives were good or bad, whether he was a speculator who after drawing a number would undertake to sell the land to some one the next day, or who would make a filing and then relinquish it to whomsoever would pay him the highest price—every person of that character in the United States by simply mailing a registered letter would be the equal of the best-intentioned and most deserving prospective settler in the United States. It seems to me the abuse would simply be aggravated by the proposed amendment.

Now, just one word further. I think there is some misapprehension about the great advantage secured by making one of these drawings. When the prospective settler goes out to Rosebud or to Standing Rock and files or registers a request there and gets a certain number, if he succeeds in drawing a number which will permit him to file, he has not secured a quarter of a section of land by any means. In fact, his troubles have just commenced. He has a number that permits him to file. But he must go and inspect the land. He must then go and enter the land. He must make settlement upon it. He must put improvements upon it. He must reside upon it; and under present conditions, which in the protection of the public domain are exacting, as they ought to be, by the time he gets through with his settlement and with his improvements, and pays what is required, he has paid practically all that the land is worth, unless he is fortunate in securing an unusually good tract. The best lands are gone. What are left are the culls; and I think the proposed remedy of the Senator from Oklahoma would really aggravate the difficulty and be an abuse.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think both of the Senators from South Dakota misapprehend my purpose. It is not my purpose to restore the old plan of opening these lands by run or rush. I think the plan of opening by registration and lottery has a great many advantages over the old system. But my purpose is to improve and perfect the system of opening by registration and lottery.

I can see no good reason why a citizen of New England, a citizen of Maryland, or a citizen of Oklahoma should be compelled to journey from his home to South Dakota, delightful as such a journey would be, merely to register and obtain a right to enter this lottery. The plan I suggest will obviate that necessity and will avoid those evils.

I went through a registration of this sort. I slept on the ground for three nights, and I know the inconveniences and the annoyances which characterize those occasions. An applicant may have to camp for two or three weeks before he can make out his registration papers. The actual business of making out the papers requires only ten or fifteen minutes, and it merely consists of answering a series of questions and swearing before a notary public that the answers are true. Those questions can be answered and that oath can be made as well in New England, Maryland, or Oklahoma as in the State of South Dakota. There are certain qualifications prescribed that would be just as applicable to the man in Virginia as to the man actually upon the ground, which dispenses with that objection urged by the Senator from South Dakota.

The opening on which I made an assault with an intent to obtain a homestead was attended by some 170,000 applicants. They came from every State in the Union. With 13,000 claims to be awarded, there were fourteen or fifteen persons who incurred that expense and that annoyance for every one person who had the good fortune to draw a claim.

It is true the homesteader does as much for the Government as the Government can do for him. But the inconveniences following entry attend one system as well as the other. I wish to make it possible for every man in the United States who desires a home to make his application without expense and without inconvenience. Many people will incur an expense of two or three hundred dollars, when the only necessary expense should be a notary fee, paid to an officer at the home of the applicant. All the advantages of the registration system can be maintained and all the disadvantages can be avoided.

Now, I marvel somewhat at, and I heard with regret, the suggestions from the Senators from South Dakota, that if this plan were adopted the applications would be infinite in number. It is suggested as an objection to the plan that there would be a limitless number of applicants. Mr. President, that is the strongest argument in favor of the plan I propose. Why disqualify any American citizen from the opportunity of obtaining a home in the glorious State of South Dakota? There are many citizens, deserving citizens, who desire a home and who are unable to make this expensive journey, and I would not close the door to the humblest citizen in this Republic.

The other evil, of persons applying for and even entering these lands who are not bona fide settlers and who have no purpose of establishing a permanent home, can be obviated by striking from the bill the commutation clause, which dispenses with the requirement of five years' residence, permitting an adventurer to enter these lands, reside upon them for eight months, and then sell them to any purchaser who may come hither.

Now, sir, that is a serious objection. It violates the spirit of the homestead law. It brings adventurers and speculators into competition with the honest home seeker; and that clause should be stricken from this bill, and at the proper time I shall move to do so.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for taking its time to the extent that I have done. But this bill only gives to the President and the Secretary of the Interior the power to prescribe the rules and manner of opening these reservations.

Now, leave that power with the President and with the Secretary, and perhaps the Senator from Oklahoma may make some wise and good suggestions to modify or change or alter the regulations proposed to be issued in this connection. I do not believe it would be wise to restrict it or to limit it in the way proposed.

This method has been found substantial, good, and has avoided the trouble and annoyance to which the department has been put heretofore. It has avoided violence and bloodshed and incessant troubles in matters of contests. This system has been evolved from the experience of the Interior Department in connection with the opening of a large number of reservations, and I think we had better let this procedure stand and this power remain where it is.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from South Dakota might very well let something go into this bill which would show to the department our opposition to the present system. I am willing to leave the greatest discretion to the department with reference to the method, but I do want in some way somehow to go on record as protesting against the miserable method that they have employed in opening up the last few reservations.

I wish to say to the Senator, with all proper apologies for differing with him, that that method was not a success. It did not prevent bloodshed. It did not prevent crime. It did not prevent the practice of all sorts of petty offenses.

Mr. GAMBLE. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. I want to say to the Senator, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. GAMBLE. Will not the Senator admit that the method pursued by the department in regard to registration and filing under this system has prevented bloodshed, has prevented difficulties, has prevented contests over the title to government lands, which were in vogue under the former system?

Mr. BURKETT. I think very possibly the Senator's observations with reference to contests is correct, and I think that is the only thing that is correct about all of it. I do not think it has done anything else than save the Government a little worry and a little expense, perhaps, in contests. It has not entirely prevented crime; it has not entirely prevented bloodshed, as I know very definitely and very certainly. No one could watch the spectacle that was witnessed in four or five towns last summer without knowing that the absolute reverse of what the Senator says is true.

Mr. GAMBLE. Does the Senator from Nebraska pretend to say that in the opening and registration of lands last fall at the Standing Rock and Cheyenne Indian reservations there was bloodshed?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; I do mean to say it.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will be very glad to have him specify it. I am a resident of that State, and so far such information has not been communicated to me.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator should read the history of the transaction. He should go back and read the newspapers.

Mr. GAMBLE. There was no crime in any locality.

Mr. BURKETT. They have just got through with the trial of a case of murder that resulted from it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I never before knew the Senator from Nebraska to be so prejudiced from reading newspapers. The facts are we had an opening of this character on the Crow Creek Reservation, a few miles south of the capital of our State, two years ago, I think it was. My colleague will remember more accurately about the time. I was there at the time. There was no mob. There never was a crowd there that the hotels could not comfortably accommodate. There was no great rush, and those lands were filed upon. People came there and registered and got their numbers and afterwards filed upon those lands without, to my personal knowledge, one unseemly incident having occurred.

Now, last year, just last fall, in the Standing Rock and Cheyenne reservations, a tract of some 3,000,000 acres was opened, and the only disappointed people were the restaurant keepers and the saloon keepers and the gamblers, who had expected to have a great mob there whom they could rob and fleece. But the great mob did not come. The trains were not overcrowded. In the aggregate, when they all got there, there were a considerable number of people, but they did not all rush in, as they did in Oklahoma, and as they did in Gregory County six or eight years ago. I am not entirely clear as to the reasons for this, but I am stating facts.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the Senator why they called out the militia?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was not last year at all.

Mr. BURKETT. It was up in South Dakota somewhere.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; if he wants to ask a question.

Mr. GORE. Yes; I do. Can the Senator from South Dakota state the number of persons who registered and the number of claims? That would give us some idea.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would not want to depend upon my recollection as being exact. I think my colleague's recollection as regards that would be more dependable than mine, because he was more actively connected with the legislation. I will ask my colleague if he can answer the question as to the number of registrations and the number of claims?

Mr. GAMBLE. My recollection is it was something less than 80,000; it may have been 67,000. I have it not clearly in mind.

I may say further that one registry point was Bismarck, the capital of the State of North Dakota, where there was perfect order; Aberdeen, one of the largest cities in the northern part of the State, where there was perfect order and where there was no trouble; and in the other four places, one of which was the capital of the State, at Pierre, and in smaller towns, there was no sign of crime. The Senator from Nebraska has simply worked upon his imagination. At one point, before the registration was had, it was thought it might be necessary to have some of the militia there. They were there for two or three days and were sent home. There was no occasion for their presence.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They were not required anyway. However, I believe the Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not want to interrupt the Senator until he gets through.

Mr. President, I am glad to hear that things all ran so smoothly up there. But I am rather surprised to hear it. As I said a moment ago, I was on one of those trains destined to a town where registration was being made, and I know something of the conditions of travel. I know there was crime. I know there was bloodshed. I know there were men killed, because they have only recently gotten through with the trial in my own State pertaining to one offense.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I merely want to reenforce the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, and to say that if I were willing to turn State's evidence I would corroborate the statement he has made.

Mr. BURKETT. As a matter of fact——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Naturally the representatives of the State of South Dakota are a little sensitive about these charges of crime and bloodshed. I should like to have specifications here. To which opening of lands does the Senator refer in connection with his inference that there were mobs and crime and bloodshed? At the one at Gregory several years ago, nearly ten years ago, I think, there was a great pressure and I think there was considerable lawlessness, but at the last two openings, the one last year and the one two years ago, I do not know of a single case of bloodshed and violence. If the Senator does I should like to have a specification.

Mr. BURKETT. I can not tell which one of the reservations it was, because I do not know enough about them. I judge it was the Gregory opening, the one four or five years ago.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was nearly ten years ago.

Mr. BURKETT. That is not any reflection on South Dakota. Those people did not come from South Dakota. Neither the party who was killed nor the men who did the killing came from South Dakota. So it is no reflection on South Dakota. Those things occur wherever you collect great numbers of people. The thugs and the bums there were not the great mass of the people who went there to get this land, but thugs and bums collected there for the particular occasion, and they always collect when crowds are going to gather.

If there was not anything else to brand that system as wrong, simply the reason that honest men and honest women have to go into these great crowds, and under conditions in which they have to go there, is enough to condemn it. I saw women going out there to make a homestead entry as the head of a family who were crowded into cars with more people than could find seats, riding all night, as they had been doing, and in conditions, sanitary and social, that were absolutely unbearable and repulsive.

When they got to the place where they had to register, the complaint was not of the people who went along there as honest entrymen, going there for homesteads; but, as I said, they were at the mercy of the gamblers and the thugs and the bums, who always follow such crowds where there is not any way of controlling them.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he is not now confining his observations to conditions in the opening that occurred in the State of Nebraska? I will say to the Senator that in the opening of the Rosebud Reservation one of the registration points was Yankton, my home town. I was there in person, and there were, I think, some 67,000 registered in practically eighteen or twenty days. Good, honest, law-abiding people came there to register, who wanted the land. They were some of the best citizens of the Northwest and from many States in the Northwest. They were not thugs or bums or gamblers. The civil authorities of the city protected them. Like conditions prevailed, Mr. President, in the recent openings in the State last fall.

I do not care to sit here and listen to a libel on the State, because I am satisfied that the Senator from Nebraska has in his mind conditions that occurred in his own State, and not the opening of Tripp County land to homesteads.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I am not going to continue this controversy. I know how sensitive are the Senators from South Dakota in regard to anything that reflects on her police system. Nevertheless, the condition was notorious at those openings in South Dakota, and it is not to be wondered at. They are small places, probably with only one constable or justice of the peace, and that is about the extent of the police power. They can not handle those crowds and never have handled those crowds.

Mr. GAMBLE. Provision was made, as required by the Interior Department, before the towns were so designated, that police regulations should prevail.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, there is not any use to be debating this question. There is not anyone who followed the newspapers or who knows anything about it who does not know that they never have been able to protect the people fully who go there, and never will. It is impossible to do it.

But that does not concern me more than the other phase of the question that I have mentioned. The Senator from South Dakota knows that I did not say that those people who went up there were all thugs and bums. If we were practicing law it would be pettifogging to put that kind of language into my mouth, because I specifically excepted ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people who go up there. They are honest people, and they go there for homesteads, but owing to the conditions they are put absolutely at the mercy of thugs and bums and gamblers, who, as I said, always follow great crowds when people are going to assemble for only a few days and then disperse, and when they know that there is no adequate police system for the protection of the crowds that so assemble.

That is not the worst thing. As I said at the opening of my remarks, I am not so much concerned about the man who goes there as the man who is prohibited from going under this system. The person who goes there has money to go, and he spends it, and I am not so much concerned about that. I am not so much concerned about what he has to encounter in the way of danger when he goes there. He takes the risk when he starts on such a trip as that. But I am concerned about the people who do not feel that they have the money to make that long trip when the possibilities of getting any of the lands are so remote. Let the Senator take the figures. Of course I do not have them here. I had not expected to say anything in opposition to the bill; but I will say to the Senator if he will adopt some sort of an amendment like the Senator from Oklahoma has offered, and then cut out the commutation clause in the bill, he will find that there will be more genuine homesteaders who want that land for homesteads who will go up there to make entries than there are to-day, when they realize that after living there only a few months they can commute and get a patent, when they never had, in fact, any intention of making a home there.

So if the Senator really wants the people to go up there who want to live there and have that as a home, let him adopt some kind of a clause like that, and give the people all over the country who need homes an opportunity to get into the drawing, and then cut out the commutation clause, so that only the men will go there who know they will have to live there five years before they get a patent. If you do that you will not find men going there for speculative purposes when they realize they will have to live five years on it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I should like to know how the Senator would solve this difficulty. As I understand it, this land must all be paid for, and the price named in the bill goes to the Indians. It is to keep the compact with the Indians, under which they assented that the lands should be thrown open to settlement, and pay them for the land that the settler is required to pay for the land. Unless the Government, out of its general fund, sees fit to pay the Indians the $2.50 an acre the Government will have to get it from the settler by commutation.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BURKETT. I will yield for a question. I wish that these replies to my remarks might wait until I am through, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if he thinks it fair to the Government to buy land to give to South Dakota? The bill provides for doing that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I think, as that is opening an entirely different question——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well; I will not take the Senator's time.

Mr. BURKETT. I would rather finish what I have to say. As I was about to say, I think, when interrupted by the Senator from South Dakota, I am not so much concerned for the purposes of this argument about whatever crime there may have been or may not have been. And if he thinks that I reflected on South Dakota too much I want to withdraw it, because I have been through South Dakota and I know there are no more peaceable and law-abiding people in the world than the people of South Dakota. A whole lot of them went up from Nebraska, and all who went from Nebraska are good people. If the Senator thinks that I intended to convey the idea to the world at large that they were not law-abiding, and that those people were thugs and bums who went there to get homesteads, on the contrary, I assure him he misunderstood me.

When I was interrupted I was about to say that I am more concerned about giving the men in this country who really need homes a chance to have a home. If the Senator will look up and find out who went out there to make that registration, he will discover that they were men from Nebraska and other adjoining States in the greatest number, men from Iowa and North Dakota and Minnesota and the States adjacent.

It is fair to say that those men are not as much distressed for homestead opportunities as the people in more remote States, like New England, Pennsylvania, New York, and other States east of the Mississippi River. Yet by the terms of the law compelling men to go there and register on the ground you practically made it prohibitive for the man back in New England, New York, or Pennsylvania to have an opportunity to get a home. He has to go across the continent and reach there, for what? Simply to say to the Government, "I want to have a chance in your wheel of fortune to get a homestead." That is all he says when he goes out there, and he spends more than $100 to go there and do it.

I say it is not fair to a man who lives on the Atlantic seaboard to put him to that disadvantage. If you want homesteaders, if you want to throw this land open to the men who most need homesteads, then, I say, do not put that penalty on them. Do not say to them, "You shall be at a disadvantage of $100 or $200 or $250 as against the man who lives out there." Let him go to a point in his own community and make his registration. If I was making the law, I would make it so severe that there would not be any speculator and there would not be any man allowed to impose on the Government's time or patience or expense to make a registration who did not expect in good faith to make a home. In my judgment, we ought to change this bill so as to prevent the recurrence of what has happened heretofore.

Now, to be sure, as the Senator from South Dakota says, when you let this registration be done everywhere, you multiply the number of those who are going to register. That is true. But what difference does it make? Suppose you multiply it by ten, it is all a lottery anyway. When you start the wheel going, what is the difference whether there are 10,000 envelopes in that wheel or 100,000 envelopes. If there are a hundred thousand envelopes instead of 10,000, there will be 46 States represented in the wheel instead of 5 or 6 States as under the present system. Let them register anywhere over this country, and you will have 46 States represented in the wheel, while if you make it under the bill as written, you will have 4 or 5 or 6 States represented in the wheel.

I submit to the Senator if you really want to give this land to people who need it for homes you should so frame the bill as to permit them to get it, and not make it prohibitive to the greater portion of the country.

Mr. GAMBLE. I suggest to the Senator to leave the power with the Secretary of the Interior, in a proclamation to be issued by the President, and possibly a better plan may be devised. But after the experience of a number of years, I do not want to accept hastily an amendment which has not been considered. Experience in this matter has gone on for years, and this is the best method so far that has been found.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, with reference to sections 16 and 36, they or their equivalent belong to South Dakota, because the Government of the United States granted sections 16 and 36 to the State in the enabling act under which the State was admitted into the Union, as it has granted to States over and over again millions of acres of public domain for the establishment and maintenance of common schools.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is all I desire to say with reference to that proposition. There are one or two other matters——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. DAVIS. Just for a question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from South Dakota certainly does not remember that his colleague in this discussion admits that sections 16 and 36 belong to the Indians, not to the State of South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The grant was made, and it was up to the Government to secure the title from the Indians to make good its grant. That is all there is to that.

Now, with reference to the five-years' settlement without pay, you have to take one of the two horns of the dilemma right there. If the settler goes and lives on his quarter section for five years and then gets his patent without paying the Government anything, the Government must pay the Indians the $2.50 an acre for the land, and if the Government does not get the money from the settler it must take it out of the general fund. But the Government will take it from the settler because the settler is getting the land and the charge of $2.50 is taken from him, while over and over again in years gone by the Government has taken $1.25 an acre from the settler. So the commutation is the only practical way by which you can get the money from the land.

Now, that leaves only one question——

GOVERNMENT OF ALASKA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 5436.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. At this time yesterday the Senate was considering Senate bill 404, and I think they were well advised as to the provisions of the bill and are ready to act upon it. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not allow the unfinished business to lie over so that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 404.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall be very glad to do so as soon as the unfinished business is formally laid before the Senate. Let the unfinished business be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Now, Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Indiana, I move to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business and to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 404.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I had the floor on the bill which was under consideration at 2 o'clock, Senate bill 183, and that bill is in a condition to be considered and disposed of promptly. I would prefer the request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that we be permitted to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 183.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is in a slight technical error. At 2 o'clock the Senator did not have the floor, although standing upon it. The unfinished business had the floor at that time, and the Senator in charge of the bill had the floor. But that is immaterial.

Here are two Senators who have preferred requests to let the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the day in order that they may proceed with their respective bills.

Mr. President, I am willing that that should be done, if either Senator prefers it in the form of a request for unanimous consent. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that I conferred with the Senator from Alabama before the morning hour expired, and he expressed to me a desire that his bill, which was under consideration yesterday for a considerable length of time, might be proceeded with to-day. I told him, on behalf of the committee of which I am chairman, that I would very cheerfully consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the day for the purpose of letting him go on with his bill.

I suggest as a matter of harmony between the two Senators, desiring to oblige them both, as I understand from the Senator from Alabama that probably it will not take very long to conclude his bill—certainly not more than three-quarters of an hour—that there will be the entire afternoon after that for the bill of the Senator from South Dakota. That is something for them to arrange between themselves.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I have in mind that Senate bill 183 had been under consideration for some time. I should judge that its discussion has been practically concluded. Those who have been participating in it are present; they have it in their mind. Of course, I do not want to take any improper course. I do not understand that any arrangement can be made, except through the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana, by myself or anyone else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that Senate bill 183 can only be proceeded with under unanimous consent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would suggest——

Mr. GAMBLE. I assume that the Sunday-observance bill can not be considered except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true, Mr. President; but I suggest, as a practical method of getting along and getting the bills of both Senators considered, that the Senator from Alabama prefer his unanimous-consent request, to which I will agree. He assures us all that his bill will not take to exceed three-quarters of an hour, at the outside. After that let the consideration of the bill of the Senator from South Dakota continue.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. KEAN. He can not give any such assurance.

Mr. GAMBLE. The only thought in my mind was what was indicated on the floor of the Senate yesterday, that, undoubtedly, the bill in the charge of the Senator from Alabama would take practically all the afternoon.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will myself prefer the request. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the day, without prejudice, retaining its status as the unfinished business to be taken up in the usual way to-morrow and thereafter. Under no consideration is it to be displaced as unfinished business.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 404.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That can be done just as soon as the unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside. And again I ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily, for to-day only, retaining its status as unfinished business, to come up to-morrow at 2 o'clock as unfinished business and to be considered thereafter as such.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Without prejudice, holding its place in all things, as I have twice stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 404.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 404) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely state, on account of the form in which the Senator put the request for unanimous consent, that I agree, of course, subject to the fact that the unfinished business, which has been temporarily laid aside, remains so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course; it can not interfere with that.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 404) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When the bill was laid aside yesterday, Mr. President, one or two amendments, very brief, and not changing substantially in any respect the bill, had been agreed to.

Now I ask leave to present a committee amendment. On page 2, I move to strike out all the words in line 2 after the word "be," and the word "act" in the third line, and to insert in lieu the words "held to have violated the provisions of this section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "be," strike out the words "liable to the penalties prescribed in this act," and in lieu insert "held to have violated the provisions of this section," so that if amended it will read:

> That persons who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be held to have violated the provisions of this section if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. On page 2, line 14, after the word "cigars," I move to insert the word "tobacco."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. On page 2, line 16, after the word "public," I move to insert the word "conveyances."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. On page 2, line 20, I move to strike out the word "ten" and insert "thirty," so as to read:

> Be punished by a fine of not more than $30.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In line 22, I move to strike out the word "ten" and insert "thirty," so as to read:

> Or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia for not more than thirty days.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In section 4, page 2, line 25, after the word "police," I move to strike out "courts" and insert "court," so as to read:

> That all prosecutions for violations of this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge to line 16, page 2. He will find there is a comma after the word "private"—that is, "for the use of private, conveyances." I think that that comma should be stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The comma should go out.

Mr. GALLINGER. It ought to go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, strike out the comma after the word "private" and before "conveyances."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Does line 16 as amended, if the comma is stricken out, permit a man to ride in his own carriage on Sunday if he has to hire the driver?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Oh, yes; I think there is no question about it. When you authorize the use of a private or public conveyance you certainly authorize the use of a driver.

Mr. DIXON. But the first part of the bill absolutely prohibits the employment of anyone on Sunday except those specially enumerated. Does not the phrase "private conveyance" require a man on Sunday in Washington to drive his own vehicle?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No; I do not think so at all. I do not think it is necessary to amend it.

Mr. DIXON. I do not see how it is possible to get any other construction of it. The first part of the bill provides that—

> It shall be unlawful for any person * * * on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to labor at any trade or calling, or to employ or cause to be employed his apprentice or servant—

And so forth.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator wants to insert the word "drivers" there, so as to include them, I shall consent to it, though it is unnecessary, in my judgment.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I think that is altogether unnecessary.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think it is, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it for granted that a carriage without a driver would be about as absurd a thing as could be imagined.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It would be as useless as a carriage without a horse.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; as useless as a carriage without a horse.

Mr. DIXON. With all due deference, Mr. President, to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and what he thinks about it, as a matter of cold fact, as the section now stands a driver can not be employed to drive a carriage on Sunday without being liable to a penalty. There is no construction of the English language that can make any other meaning out of the section.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not accept the amendment which I suggest? In line 1, page 2, I suggest that the word "Sabbath" be stricken out, and the words "day of rest" inserted, and also in line 3, on the same page, to strike out the word "Sabbath" and insert the words "day of rest," so that it would read:

> That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a day of rest any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a day of rest one day in each seven, as herein provided.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there is anything in the bill about sacred concerts being excepted from its provisions?

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is another matter pending, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. What other matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I have suggested an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MONEY. What is the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment is to strike out on page 2, line 1, the word "Sabbath" and to insert the words "day of rest," so that the proviso would read:

That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a day of rest any other day in the week than Sunday.

And so forth.

I wish simply to say that I am in full accord with the observance of the Sabbath. I believe in worshiping on that day; but I think we should be getting on very dangerous ground if we should begin to legislate upon religious questions. The generally accepted meaning of Sabbath is Sunday, and I believe the words "day of rest" would be preferable to Sunday, for no one could claim they have reference to any particular day.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I have no horror of the name "Sabbath;" I have grown up under that; but I am perfectly willing, as the substance will remain, to strike out the word "Sabbath," in lines 1 and 3, and to insert the words "day of rest." That will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah, then, does not offer an amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I offered the amendment, and the Senator has accepted it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama can not accept the amendment. The bill is in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the Senator accepted the suggestion of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah offered the suggestion and the Senator from Alabama will offer the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Utah offers the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then, does the Senator from Alabama offer the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I offered the amendment, and the Senator from Alabama, having the bill in charge, has accepted the suggestion which I offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has the bill in charge.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the question be put, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "Sabbath" and to insert the words "day of rest;" and in line 3 on the same page, before the word "one," to strike out the word "Sabbath" and to insert the words "day of rest," so that, if amended, the proviso would read:

Provided, That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a day of rest any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a day of rest one day in each seven, as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the bill as now perfected provides that it shall be unlawful for any person on the first day of the week to labor at any of the trades or callings therein specified, provided, however, that if on any other day of the week he takes one day of rest he shall not be liable for the penalties. In other words, if a man works all the week and lays off on Sunday—a barber or a plumber or a carpenter—and then on Sunday chooses to work, in order to avoid the penalty of the bill as it now stands all he has to do in a court of justice is to prove to the court that on Tuesday he lays off from his work and rests. In all seriousness, I want to ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. GALLINGER] whether the provisions of the bill which we are now about to pass must not be construed in this way?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for myself I would say that I think the Senator's point is well taken. Had I been in charge of the bill I would not have accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], because I think the word "Sabbath" ought to remain in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

LANDS IN ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. GAMBLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 183) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GAMBLE. I make the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and I do not think that requires unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order for the day has been laid aside by unanimous consent, and the Chair thinks that the motion of the Senator from South Dakota is in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from South Dakota.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], which has heretofore been read.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] requested me to say to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] that he had gone to the library to look up some authorities in reference to this bill, and that he trusted the Senator from South Dakota would not press the matter until his return. That is the reason why I called the attention of the Chair to the fact that I thought unanimous consent was necessary for the consideration of the bill. I trust the Senator from South Dakota will not press this matter until the Senator from Oklahoma shall return to the Chamber.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I desire to be most courteous, and in no sense do I want to be discourteous to either the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] or the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. This bill, however, has been pending before the Senate for practically two hours this morning. I do not know that the Senate can suspend its business, and I do not know that I should be called upon to lay aside the bill while an examination was being conducted in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crane	Guggenheim	Piles
Bankhead	Crawford	Heyburn	Rayner
Beveridge	Cullom	Johnston	Root
Borah	Cummins	Jones	Scott
Bourne	Davis	Kean	Simmons
Brandegee	Depew	La Follette	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Dixon	Lodge	Smith, S. C.
Brown	du Pont	Martin	Smoot
Bulkeley	Flint	Money	Stephenson
Burkett	Frazier	Nixon	Sutherland
Burnham	Frye	Oliver	Taliaferro
Burrows	Gallinger	Overman	Warren
Burton	Gamble	Owen	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Gordon	Page
Clapp	Gore	Paynter

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CLAY] is necessarily detained from the Chamber by illness.

Mr. FLINT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] is unable to be present at the session of the Senate to-day on account of illness.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire the status of the bill providing for the opening of the Rosebud Indian Reservation?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. GORE. Was it placed before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was done on motion adopted by the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have been informed during the progress of the debate that occurred a moment ago that President Hill, of the Great Northern Railroad, stated in a speech, and I believe in an interview, that certain of these openings brought more than a million of dollars into the treasury of his road; that it was a fraud and a robbery on the people; and that if he could ascertain the names and addresses of those people he would return the money. I have been informed that it might be possible to obtain and authenticate that interview, and

I should like to have time to do it, because it certainly ought to be conclusive if it can be done. I move, therefore, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, this bill has been on the calendar for some time. This is the fourth time it has been reached for consideration. This subject has been fully discussed, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has been considered and has been voted upon. I do not care to take the time of the Senate in discussing this motion or the method of land opening; but under the experience of the Interior Department the procedure which is now and has been in vogue for a number of years past has been the outgrowth of the experience, wisdom, and judgment of the Interior Department. I say, so far as I am concerned, that from the experience we have had with it in the State of South Dakota it has worked well.

To throw open to every man and woman in the United States the opportunity of filing, I submit, would tie up the opening of this reservation indefinitely by having a million people make filings who never would contemplate going upon the land, because these lands will be opened, as proposed under this measure, on an appraisement on their value. Any settler intending to settle and take the land must not only be a homesteader and reside upon the land, but must pay to the Government for the Indians the appraised valuation of the land. It is no easy matter to go out there and carry out this undertaking. I submit that we should proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether a vote was taken on the amendment which I offered?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORE. I was absent from the Chamber only about four or five minutes, and I express my regret that it occurred during my absence. It seems to me, if the suggestion I have just made with reference to a million dollars being collected unfairly and unwarrantedly from the people can be substantiated, it certainly ought to be done. The land in South Dakota will probably keep, and I see no reason why every Senator should be expected to sacrifice the interests of every one of his constituents in order to boom and boost two or three towns in the State of South Dakota, for that is what this amounts to.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I have apologized many times for taking the time of the Senate, but twenty years ago practically the entire western half of the State was an Indian reservation. It has been opened gradually and by degrees. The Indian reservations have stood as a menace to the development and the growth of the Commonwealth. The Indians themselves agreed to the provisions of this bill after it had been submitted to them for their consideration. The department agreed to it. It follows in line, Mr. President, with all of the measures providing for opening reservations in the Western States.

It is suggested that the consideration of this bill be suspended until some rumor or newspaper report to the effect that somebody has made an observation as to the receipts from the transportation of passengers to land openings could be run down or some interview inquired into. I submit, Mr. President, that is not a sufficient reason to delay the passage of this bill. In fairness and in justice to the importance of the measure and to the interests of the Indians and the interests of the people of South Dakota this bill ought to pass.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to postpone the consideration of the bill indefinitely.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I did not mean indefinitely, but to postpone the present consideration of the bill. If it is necessary to fix a date, I will suggest a date. I supposed that motion was in order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That can not be done.

Mr. GORE. I am as anxious as the Senator from South Dakota that this land should be opened and then converted into homes, and I have no disposition to delay or defeat the measure. I move that it be postponed for a week. I think in that time possibly I can ascertain from the library regarding the matter, and obtain the information I desire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator modify his motion?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator was not here when the unfinished business was laid aside by unanimous consent, but retaining its place as unfinished business, it being laid aside temporarily for to-day only. It would be impossible, therefore, for the Senator now to make a motion for the postponement of the consideration of this bill for a week, because the unfinished business, by unanimous consent, retains its place. The Senator can not move, therefore, the postponement of the consideration of the bill to a day certain. The time for the consideration of the bill has already been fixed by unanimous consent when the Senator was out of the Chamber.

Mr. GORE. Then, is it the unfinished business?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No. The unfinished business, by unanimous consent, was laid aside temporarily for the day only, the unanimous-consent agreement including that statement, and also that it was to resume its place to-morrow and hereafter every day at 2 o'clock. Therefore the Senator must see that he can not move to postpone the consideration of the pending bill to a fixed date.

Mr. GORE. I suppose a motion would be unavailing, anyway, but I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed for to-day.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, as I understand, no amendment is pending to the bill. The only amendment proposed was that by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and that has been rejected. The only basis for the request for delay is that somewhere in some newspaper it was stated that some railroad president told how much money his company got from the passengers who flocked to one of these openings somewhere, and that "somewhere" is not yet stated. It seems to me that that is hardly a sufficient reason why a deliberative body should, when a bill has been reached for consideration after quite full discussion, delay action upon it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will make a suggestion, which I think the Senator from Oklahoma can follow.

Mr. GORE. I inquire whether it is not possible by objection to the further consideration of this measure to have it passed from Rule VIII to Rule IX?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; the Senate has determined by motion to consider the bill now.

Mr. GORE. I was not aware of that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, it was stated that his amendment had been disagreed to on a vote while he was out of the Chamber. I suggest to the Senator that he can submit his amendment again in the Senate. So he has lost no right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to postpone indefinitely the consideration of the pending bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Gordon	Piles
Beveridge	Crawford	Gore	Rayner
Borah	Cullom	Guggenheim	Root
Bourne	Cummins	Hughes	Scott
Brandegee	Davis	Jones	Shively
Bristow	Depew	Kean	Simmons
Brown	Dolliver	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Bulkeley	Elkins	McEnery	Smoot
Burkett	Fletcher	Martin	Stephenson
Burnham	Flint	Money	Stone
Burrows	Frazier	Nixon	Warren
Burton	Frye	Oliver	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Gallinger	Owen

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to say—and I wish my statement to cover the several calls which I anticipate may be made this afternoon—that my colleague [Mr. NELSON] is to-day absent on committee work by authority of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The statement of the Senator from Minnesota is entirely gratuitous. A Senator has a right to demand a call of the roll at any time, and I expect to exercise that right as long as I think it is the proper thing to do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. GORE. I submit one other amendment. I do not care to make any remarks upon it. It relates to striking out the commutation clause, beginning, I believe, in line 23, page 6, and closing with the word "made," in line 3, on page 7. It simply closes the door to adventurers and speculators who might file under the provisions of the proposed act and limits the filing to actual and bona fide homesteaders as far as possible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on page 6, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the following:

And provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed herein, receiving credit for the payments previously made.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that this is the uniform provision in all these bills. So far as concerns the question of good faith, the settler must pay one-fifth of the appraised value of the land upon entry, and before any commutation can be made there has to be a residence of fourteen months, and one-fifth more paid. So all questions as to the good faith of a homesteader are abundantly provided for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GORE. I desire to submit in the Senate the amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 2, the following proviso:

Provided, That applicants to enter said lands shall be allowed to forward their applications by registered mail to the authorities of the local land office, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. I do not care to discuss it further.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will state it.

Mr. GAMBLE. I do not think any business has been transacted since the last roll call.

Mr. LODGE. We have taken two or three votes.

Mr. GAMBLE. The same question has just been raised, and it is only dilatory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks business has intervened. The bill has progressed from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, and the Senate has acted upon an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Two amendments, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clapp	Frye	Nixon
Bankhead	Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger	Oliver
Beveridge	Crawford	Gamble	Overman
Borah	Cullom	Gore	Owen
Bourne	Cummins	Hughes	Page
Bristow	Davis	Johnston	Piles
Brown	Depew	Jones	Shively
Bulkeley	Dixon	Kean	Simmons

Mr. BACON. I do not think it is necessary to repeat the announcement already made as to the cause of the absence of my colleague [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. KEAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is necessarily absent.

Mr. DU PONT. My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PINE RIDGE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. GAMBLE obtained the floor.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota was recognized.

Mr. GAMBLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2341) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect. It is the next bill on the calendar, and contains practically the same provisions affecting an adjoining reservation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. Pending the reading of the bill, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GAMBLE. I simply wish to make a suggestion. The bill which has just been disposed of relates to the Rosebud Indian Reservation. This applies to the Pine Ridge Reservation.

Mr. KEAN. I understand that.

Mr. GAMBLE. It is adjacent.

Mr. KEAN. But they are entirely different reservations.

Mr. GAMBLE. The other bill has been so fully considered and discussed——

Mr. GALLINGER. Question, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GAMBLE. I concede his right to do that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the question be put, Mr. President. It is not debatable.

Mr. KEAN. Let this bill come up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 28, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate January 27, 1910.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

William J. Maxwell, of New York, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of New York, in place of Edward B. Jordan, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 27, 1910.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Charles A. Houts to be United States attorney for the eastern district of Missouri.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

John H. McDevitt, jr., to be receiver of public moneys at Durango, Colo.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Commander Samuel S. Robison to be a commander.
Lieut. Commander Charles F. Hughes to be a commander.

ASSISTANT PAYMASTERS IN THE NAVY.

Duette W. Rose.
Irwin D. Coyle.
Paul A. Clarke.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSIONER.

Charles H. West to be a member of the Mississippi River Commission.

POSTMASTERS.

CONNECTICUT.

Seth Pratt, at Litchfield, Conn.

NEW YORK.

Howard G. Dewey, at Gloversville, N. Y.
George E. Perrin, at Batavia, N. Y.

PENNSYLVANIA.

John C. Chamberlain, at Everett, Pa.
Harry L. Johnson, at Laceyville, Pa.

WISCONSIN.

Andrew Noll, at Chilton, Wis.
Charles P. Peterson, at Glenwood, Wis.
Everett A. Upham, at Marshfield, Wis.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 27, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the RECORD of January 25 corrected. In the consideration of the bill establishing a bureau of mines, it appears that I offered an amendment and the RECORD does not show that the amendment was adopted by the House. In the bill as reported to the Senate it shows that the amendment is in the bill. I would like to have the matter corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Journal is correct and that the RECORD has already been corrected, as the gentleman suggests.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911. And pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate, the time for which was fixed the other day at five hours, be extended two hours, the time to be equally divided between the two sides.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill; and pending that, asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate, which was fixed at five hours, be extended two hours, the extra time to be controlled as the five hours was to be controlled. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SCOTT was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: During the next few months the Payne tariff act will be the most interesting and fruitful subject of discussion—interesting, because it will attract the attention of the entire country; fruitful, because upon the result of that discussion and the verdict of the people thereon will depend the complexion of the next House of Representatives and, possibly, the character of the next presidential administration.

The Payne tariff act must justify itself or the Republican party must go out of power. [Applause.] The satisfaction in the applauding of that sentiment by those who hope to succeed us is as near as they will come to the enjoyment of the succession [laughter and applause], because the Payne tariff act has justified itself, is justifying itself, and will continue to justify itself. When it had been in operation about six weeks the President of the United States said that it was the best tariff act that had ever been enacted in this country. That statement met with criticism, but most of the criticisms were profitless, owing to the ignorance or political prejudice—even descending to partisan bigotry—or the self-interest of those who differed with the President. Some of these critics claimed that the President was rash and was indulging in prophecy as to the effect of the schedules; but let me call your attention to the fact that President Taft had in mind much more than the schedules in the Payne tariff act. In the Payne tariff act there are 42 sections, and only the first section deals with the schedules. In the other sections are found legislation improving the administration of the customs, the maximum and minimum provision enabling us to deal on an equality with other nations, an amplification of the present drawback provision, freer trade relations with the Philippines, the provision for the Panama bonds, improvement in many of the internal-revenue laws, the creation of a customs court located here in Washington, removed from the distracting influences of the port of entry, and the establishment of a commission or board of tariff experts.

All these matters were in the mind of President Taft when he said that this was the best tariff law that had ever been enacted. And whoever voted against the Payne tariff law not only voted against the general reductions in the schedules of the Dingley law, but voted against all of these acts of progressive legislation.

President Taft, in his expression concerning the Payne tariff, has shown that same breadth of vision, that same lofty statesmanship, that healthy common sense and sagacity which augur so well for the success of this administration and foretell the triumphant reelection of President Taft in 1912. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the campaign on which we are about to enter, this Payne tariff act will be held by its opponents to be responsible for every evil from which any section of the country may be suffering. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will have to meet that; but in addition to that it will be said that the Payne tariff act gave undue preference to certain interests, that it gave undue preference to certain individuals, that it is the present cause of high prices [applause on the Democratic side], that it is encouraging the combination of trusts. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, let us see how these objections to the tariff act are to be met. In the first place it will be claimed that the tariff has not brought prosperity [applause on the Democratic side]; it will be claimed that it retards prosperity [applause on the Democratic side]; it will be claimed that the tariff has brought its burdens. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, why is it that Democrats in the mass always applaud any tale of misfortune or prediction of disaster? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I think it must be because such references are so familiar to them, so in keeping with the entire history of their party [applause on the Republican side], and so their applause, instead of being an act of approbation, is a reluctant act of party loyalty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to how dangerous it is to make predictions in reference to the effect of a tariff. Let me say, in the first place, that the Payne tariff act is an orderly and sane modification of the Dingley Act to meet present conditions, and the Payne tariff act is a monument to the indefatigable zeal, industry, and good judgment of our colleague whose name the act will always bear. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have to meet the same kind of criticisms of the Payne tariff act that we had to meet when the Dingley tariff act was passed, and so before I proceed to the more important part of my argument I want to fix in your minds the dangers of making predictions in reference to a tariff. I might spend this entire legislative day in reading choice excerpts of violent and extravagant language of almost every Member on the minority side of this House in 1897, predicting dire disaster from the passage of the Dingley Act, but I shall confine myself to simply a few illustrations from some of the leaders of the party. When the Dingley bill was under consideration, Mr. BAILEY, of Texas, then the leader of the minority, on March 19, 1897, said:

> You promise to make the times better for all the people, and you must redeem that promise or be driven from the high places which you occupy. Four years of the taxation proposed in this bill will prove a severe drain upon the energies of our people and the resources of our country, but if they demonstrate, as I believe they will, the vicious error of the protective system, the lesson, though costly, will be worth its price.

Of course that was followed with applause on the Democratic side. Again, on April 10, he said:

> If you succeed, the Democratic party might as well not make a nomination in the next presidential election.

He might have extended that prophecy to three more presidential elections. [Applause on the Republican side.] He continued:

> Now, let us give the country a chance to decide who is right and who is wrong. You have applied your remedy. I am confident it will fail. I am so confident of its failure that I want to raise no other issue. I want the country to decide between your wisdom and ours upon the measures which have already been proposed. Let the country say whether it is tariff revision or financial reform which shall work out our redemption.

Again he said:

> If you demonstrate, as demonstrate you will, that a high tariff under a gold standard will not bring prosperity, I will stake my political fortune on the proposition that the American people will then vote to restore bimetallism as the only means of restoring prosperity to this country.

Which, of course, met with Democratic applause. On July 19, Mr. Lanham, of Texas, a gentleman whom we all remember with pleasure, who was subsequently honored with several terms in the governorship of that great State, said this:

> Pass your bill, reeking as it does with blight and burden, carrying as it does disaster and distress, freighted as it is with woe and waste, filled as it is with injustice and oppression to your fellowmen.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], now the leader of the minority, whom we always like to hear, especially when he is in a prophetic vein, indulged in many prophecies as to what would happen if we passed the Dingley law. Among other things he told about the reception which this bill would meet with in the South and West—

That the farmers will dig you up with their hoes, plow you up with their plows, beat you with their mauls, hackle you with their harrows, hammer you with their sledges, rake you with their currycombs, pulverize you with their disks, cut you down with their axes, split you to pieces with their froes, ride you on their barbed-wire fences, toss you with their pitchforks, smite you with their pile drivers, grind you through their sausage mills [laughter], mow you down with their reapers, bind you up in great bundles, run you through their thrashing machines, and scatter you as worthless chaff, because you are raising the price of all farming implements by 45 per cent.

If the kind of digging and mauling and hoeing that the people of Missouri gave under the Dingley law they will simply repeat in the same proportion in which their harvests and prosperity have increased, then, Mr. Chairman, there will not be a Democratic Member returned from the State of Missouri at the next election. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

But what he said to which I want to call your special attention—and I simply brought in the prophecy to show how dangerous prophecy was—what I want to call special attention to, in a serious vein, is this. On March 30 Mr. CLARK said:

We—

Referring to the people of the South and West—

may be fools and leather heads, and all that sort of thing, but I tell you, gentlemen, the people living west of the Allegheny Mountains and south of the Potomac have sense to know when they are sandbagged and held up.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

It was the opinion of the gentleman from Missouri that under the Dingley tariff law prosperity could not come to the farming classes of the West and South. And now I come to the pleasant task set before me this morning, and that is to direct your attention to one section of the country, and that is the section which is supposed would be most injured by the Dingley law and which, it is claimed, has been and will be most injured by the Payne law. I refer to the South, and I will begin with the State of Texas.

Now, bear in mind, gentlemen, the simple task that I have set before myself, because I want to forestall the jumping up of anyone on the other side of the House to ask if I claim that the Payne tariff and the Dingley tariff law bring on the seasons and the full moon and the tides and the early and the latter rains. No; I do not claim that at all, and I am not going to give you any occasion to rise, as you always do when prosperity is spoken of, and ask those questions. The simple proposition to which I propose to address myself this morning is this, that just as the Dingley law did not bring blight and burden, woe and waste, so the Payne tariff law is not bringing blight and burden, woe and waste. I hope it will be my pleasure later on during this session to address myself to some of the other questions which come up in this tariff discussion, particularly those relating to prices, which have been alluded to by my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but the time allotted to me this morning will be simply devoted to that one proposition. To show why I address myself to the one proposition, I want to read you what was said in this House only a few days ago by a gentleman from the South, in a carefully prepared speech which he read from manuscript. He said:

Deliberately considering the Payne-Aldrich bill, I here state that, after a most exhaustive analysis, in my judgment it is the most outrageous tax measure ever placed upon the statutes of any government in Christendom.

That, of course, met with applause on the Democratic side. Then, after referring to the Republican platform, the gentleman said:

The plighted faith was not kept but cruelly broken, and the demands for lighter tax burdens answered with a law piling the load still higher upon a groaning people.

This statement was also received with Democratic applause.

I want to ask you gentlemen of the committee, I want to ask the people of the country, have you heard the people of Texas groaning under their burden? That language was used by a Member from Texas—great, strong, rich, free, enlightened, proud, ambitious, courageous, progressive Texas. Texas, the only one of the sisterhood of States that came into the Union clad in the spotless robes of sovereignty and wearing the gleaming star of independence on her brow. [Applause.] Now, then, have you heard the people of Texas groaning?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. With great pleasure, providing it is something bright and cheerful and encouraging, and not anything so dismal that your colleagues will applaud.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The time from 1866 to 1872 we did groan under Republican rule; but since that time, under the Democratic party, we have prospered as no other State has prospered.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will be very glad to enlighten not only the gentleman from Texas, but the other members of the committee, more fully as to what the present views are in Texas and whether there is any groaning down there.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I speak of the state administration, and that is the reason why we are at present so prosperous. It is because we are under Democratic laws and have been since 1872.

Mr. BOUTELL. I was quite prepared for that, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. I hold in my hand the message of the governor of Texas to the general legislature, dated January 14, 1909, and it is simply a repetition of the messages of all Democratic governors since the Dingley tariff law was passed. He says:

You have assembled under favorable conditions. The state treasury is on a cash basis. The State is generally prosperous, and the people are contented and happy.

Anybody groaning there? Then he further states:

With respect to the oil and rice industries, the platform of the Democratic party reads as follows:

Recognizing that the oil and rice industries are of great importance to the growth of the State, we recommend legislation that will protect them.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. I will have to decline to be interrupted until I have outlined a little more fully the conditions in Texas, and then I will be very glad to yield.

The gentleman who made this statement about the groaning people comes from the wide-awake city of Waco. We all like him. I do not know why he made that speech. I believe he is as sorry for it now as anybody. Apparently there are no Republicans in his district. If there was any Republican there that I thought had any chance of being elected I would go down there to help him; but if the gentleman from Texas who made that speech has any kind of a contest with any other Democrat in the eleventh district of Texas I think he can get an indorsement from this side of the House as one of the most attentive, most intelligent, and best Members on either side of the House of Representatives on all matters not involved in politics. And if the reason for his making that address was, as I say, the result of any contest with any other Democrat, I would be willing myself to go down there and endeavor to make the hair fly in behalf of our friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. Just at this point I must decline to yield. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that I am going to come to his district after a while, but I must decline to yield until I place before the members of the committee a broad view of the conditions in Texas, and then we can carry on the colloquy with a little more intelligence.

I have here the Waco Times-Herald, which is spoken of as the official organ of the city. I therefore take it that it is a good Democratic paper. I judge so from some of its editorials. If it is not, I hope my good friend, the gentleman from the eleventh district of Texas, will correct me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly. Any paper supporting me evinces the highest evidence of Democracy. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. That is a sufficient hall-mark of its character. If the paper has supported the gentleman from Texas it is a good Democratic paper. Here is what it says in the issue of December 31:

It has been a good old year, this one now departing. The children of men, taking the whole view, have been abundantly blessed. The earth has responded in bounteous measure to the husbandman's appeal. There has been no very great calamity. Despite the assaults of both large and petty despots, the citadel of freedom stands fast and from her ramparts floats the flag of liberty.

* * * * * * *

Here in Texas we have been afflicted with charlatan statesmanship and with cormorant cunning.

[Laughter.]

I believe the gentleman from the district of 40 counties [Mr. STEPHENS] said that conditions in Texas were entirely due to the Democratic state administration. The paper says further:

But they have not been able to hold us back; we are making progress. Ourselves the recipients of favors from those gone before, we recognize our obligations to those who are to come after, and hence constant endeavor, from which will issue the greatest commonwealth in the American Union.

* * * * * * *

This city of Waco has greatly prospered, and in all the world there is not a more fit place in which to live. A spirit of good fellowship has presided in our deliberations, and the immediate future holds for us a full realization of our highest hopes.

* * * * * * *

All in all, you have been good to us, dear old Naught Nine. So long; take keer o' yourself, old chap.

Any groaning in Waco?

In an editorial in this paper, of January 2, 1910, I find this, and I want to say right here that there is no reading more inspiring or more exhilarating than the editorials and the advertisements from the southern papers at this time, and of all the papers printed in the South, I know of none more full of life and energy and enthusiasm than the papers of Texas. Listen to this from the Waco Times-Herald:

TEXAS.

[Waco Times-Herald editorial, January 2, 1910.]

Yes, Waco is going to have a sky scraper, which is a demonstration that some of us, brethren beloved, are confident as to her future. But shall we be content with one? Why not a dozen sky scrapers? Shall we not make it possible for Sanger Brothers to come to the corner with a magnificent structure? And shall we not have a vision of a royal palace for Goldstein & Migel? And shall we not be getting ready to greet the Mistrots in marble hall? The list can be indefinitely extended if only our old men will dream dreams and our young men see visions.

And so down there in that part of Texas, where the Mistrots are dreaming of dwelling in marble halls, is it only our friends here that are seeing visions and having nightmares?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to state, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman that the editorial from the Waco paper, my home paper, was written just after the prospect of tariff reform downward, which the Republican party had promised the country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Why, the applause on the other side of the House greets a statement which is just one year wrong in its date. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] The paper is dated January 2, 1910, published just a few weeks ago. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Evidently the paper is repeating their good editorials. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Well, it is good enough to repeat. [Renewed laughter.] They can go on repeating it as long as the Payne tariff law stays in force.

Well, I can not linger much longer in Waco, much as I like the dear old town. [Laughter.] But here is something which may explain what the gentleman from Texas took for groaning down in his district.

In the Waco Daily Times-Herald, January 5, 1910, not 1909, there is an editorial entitled "Peffer's proposal," and it quotes something from a magazine article of that venerable and hirsute advocate of depreciated coinage [laughter], and here is what it says:

GROANS IN ELEVENTH DISTRICT, TEXAS.

[Waco Daily Times-Herald editorial, January 5, 1910.]

PEFFER'S PROPOSAL.

Mr. Peffer is seeking to revive the old fiat-money theory. Back of national-bank notes is real wealth. The Government has no money, save what it gets by and through taxation.

The Democratic party lost the country's confidence by proposing to fiat 50 cents in every dollar; Bryan and BAILEY and CHAMP CLARK and all the rest led a well-fed donkey out of the house of our fathers, and the poor old chap is still wandering on the bleak hillsides.

[Editorial, January 15, 1910.]

This is to be Waco's best and biggest year, unless all signs fail.
Put your money in Waco dirt.

[Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, in all fairness to my good friend from Texas, is it not possible—no; is it not highly probable—that what he mistook for the groaning of the people of his district, struggling under their burdens, was in reality a touching and plaintive braying of this poor donkey, with downcast ears and conspicuous ribs, plaintively braying on the bleak hillsides of political disaster? [Great laughter.] Is anybody groaning in the fifth district, which is the district that has in it, I believe, the splendid city of Dallas? I read an editorial from the Dallas Morning News:

THE NEW YEAR'S PROMISE FOR TEXAS.

This is to be a year of greater achievements in Texas than any the State has known in a like period. Certainly the prospect has never been more promising at the beginning of a year than it is now. It holds forth the promise of many big things, and we ought to adjust our perspective to fit the prospect.

This would be a splendid motto for you gentlemen on the other side of the House and for some gentlemen on this side of the House: "Adjust your perspective to fit the prospect."

How is it in the fifteenth district, along down farther toward the southwest? Any groaning there? I read an editorial from the Mercedes Enterprise, Thursday, January 6, 1910, as well as I can:

Se necesitan 1,000 hombres inmediatemente para que trabajen por sueldo ó contrata en: limpiar, desenraizar, cercar, romper tierra y plantar caña. Todo trabajo por contrata será bajo la responsabilidad del solicitante. Las personas que desen trabajar pueden dirigirse al establecimiento del Sr. White ó escribir bajo la dirección J. D. White.

Is there any groaning in the fifteenth district? [Laughter.] I am glad to welcome to our midst the representative from the fifteenth district; but let me say, lest perhaps he lets fall all that he has in his mind, that if there is any groaning in the fifteenth district, I think it must be from the shock which the people have sustained down there in hearing me try to read this Spanish.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my friend from Illinois to include in the RECORD his pronunciation of the article which he has just read. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Would it be in order to ask the official reporter to read it, so that we may determine whether the gentleman from Illinois should be called to order or not? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. We have it all here in a good Democratic paper translated into King's English:

Mr. J. D. White needs 1,000 men. He has a contract to clear, grub, fence, plow, and plant 2,000 acres of land in sugar cane. His contract must be completed not later than the middle of March, and he must have the men. This is the cooperative acreage, a combination recently effected among the owners of small tracts of land, by which it is believed cane can be grown very profitably on the smaller tracts. It is authoritatively conceded that the Rio Grande Valley is the best sugar-growing proposition in the United States, and the combination referred to permits the man of moderate means to get into the proposition. The acreage which Mr. White has contracted to plant lays along the Mercedes Canal and the La Feria Canal. Six cars of seed cane have been planted in this vicinity already during this planting season, and it is estimated that the acreage planted to cane along these two canals will not be less than 5,000 at the end of the planting season.

No serious groaning in the fifteenth district.

Is there an "groaners' club" in the tenth district, the district represented by my good friend Mr. BURLESON? I am glad to welcome him to this love feast over conditions in Texas. I hold in my hand the Austin Daily Statesman of January 1. I will read an editorial entitled—

THE NEW YEAR.

"Since the radiant morn of creation broke" and the morning stars sang together for joy there has been no year dawned upon the earth so fraught with illimitable possibilities for human achievement, so freighted with resplendent hope and world-wide expectancy, or one more darkly lowering with ominous responsibility for civilization than the year 1910 just dawning upon the world to-day.

* * * * * * *

Nineteen hundred and nine brought almost to full bloom the flower of human rights and human freedom planted in the wilderness of the New World less than two centuries ago. Will 1910 take up the work and carry it to fruition? With the absolute conquest of the elements of earth, air, and water, and the lessons of sixty centuries, can not the human mind at last realize its fondest ambitions and secure to mankind the permanency of his acquirements and the lasting benefits of his efforts and his toils.

* * * * * * *

Coming to our own fair Southland, the year just ushered in is full of glorious promise and the fulfillment of its possibilities is something better to engage the attention than controversy concerning unprofitable mistakes or misfortunes of the past. With the present indications that the world's demands for cotton will continue to exceed the supply, which will maintain the present profitable prices, owning the largest timber supply in the country, and with its coal and iron ores in inexhaustible quantities, it is independent of the world in natural resources, while its great agricultural staples are continually creating new markets and extending the area of its commercial efforts. What more is wanted? All of these things mark a high destiny for the South, and to be reached and secured the proper effort must be put forward in 1910, and southern thought and southern energy should be directed to the future, with no time to wrangle over old issues or resent imaginary insults—not that she has anything to be ashamed of in her past. She has no apologies to make and no convictions to surrender. She is secure in the cherished virtues of the home and fireside, and her chief aim is to grasp the immense possibilities held so dazzingly before her eyes by the young giant, "1910."

The groaning in that district seems very cheerful.

Is there any "groaners' club" in the twelfth district? In order to find out I shall have recourse to the Fort Worth Record of January 1. I read from an editorial entitled:

NEW YEAR GREETINGS.

To superficial observation Texas has had a hard year, but even a casual glance at reports in to-day's Record will convince the most morose pessimist that he is in error. It has not been a hard year. There has been compensation for the loss of crops in the higher price; there has been no lagging of industry, no halt in development; Texas is still bounding forward in all the strength and vigor of healthful youth, and her people were never so confident and resolute as they are to-day. There is inspiration in the messages of good cheer and high purpose which our correspondents bring from every quarter.

And the same confident and persevering purpose prevails in Fort Worth. The announcements of business men are not the airy talk of boomers or dreamers, but the firm declarations of seasoned enterprise that has tested itself and knows its power to do what it undertakes.

Fort Worth and Texas have every reason to indulge the hope of a prosperous and happy New Year.

And on the front page of this fine, enterprising paper is this New Year's resolve:

Resolved, That I will work harder in 1910 than ever before for my business, my town, and my State; that I will do a citizen's duty; that I will not welch; that I will not mock; that I will do my best every day and help to make Texas hum all the year.

No audible groaning going on where that paper is published.

How is it in the sixteenth district? I have here the San Angelo Press-News of January 1, 1910:

We bid farewell to 1909 with hearts attuned to the sentiments of the great bard who declared that "parting is such sweet sorrow."

Sometimes we wonder if the world would not be a little brighter and the people more contented if we could never look back.

The good men do oft die with them, even through the evil is not interred with the bones.

The past is gone, gone forever, save from the hearts that grieve and the souls that have been seared. Darkness is a natural state. The sun alone furnishes us with light. And so it is natural for the heart to hold memories of the past that depress and forget the memories of the past that cheer.

But 1909 has been a good year, one in which great deeds have been performed; one that has marked additional conquests by man; and one that will have a page of ample fullness in the histories that will be written in the years to come.

For 1910 let us pitch our hopes high and then let us keep our energies unbent until we realize the ideals that inspire us.

We can unite all the little deeds of kindness done during the coming year and show that the world is growing better, just as we can marshal all the deeds of evil that marked 1909 to show that the world is not making Christian progress.

The Press-News knows not how to express its great appreciation of the many favors this paper has received from the good people of San Angelo. We came among you and you received us with kindness. We worked with you and you inspired us with vigor. We have learned to have affection for you, and affection is the momentum that keeps love going forever and forever. We have not endeavored to overreach ourselves, but we have tried to keep abreast of the times and to keep pace with the growth of this city.

And now when 1910 is fragrant with newness; when the last echo of the year agone has died upon the air of time, never again to be heard on earth, the Press-News, under the solemnity of the moment can but use the words of a poet to the friends, whom we hope will abide with us always:

"May the birds of love build nests in your house; may your pathway be strewn with sweet lotus, and may your troubles be but mirages that vanish into thin air when you approach them."

Any indications of groaning in that part of Texas?

How is it in the fourteenth district? I have here the San Antonio Daily Express of January 1:

Prosperity has smiled on Texas throughout the year just ended, and San Antonio and the southwestern portion of the State have been especially favored. The fruits of husbandry have been most satisfying, and commercially and otherwise the city has moved forward by leaps and bounds. Looking around us on all sides we see the evidences of growth and development in industry, in population, in material progress, in the higher purposes of moral and æsthetic uplift, and in spiritual as well as material advancement and the spirit of harmony and concord that is all-prevailing.

Looking about us this New Year's morn there are to be seen only roseate prospects of the coming season. The farmers and stockmen have been singularly blessed in the moisture that has prepared the ground for the crops to be and for the grass that will early cover the range and make sleek and fat the stock that will feed thereon. The merchant and business man will profit by the prosperity of the farmer and stockman and the city derive its share of the benefits.

The future looks bright and promising for us all, and the wish for a happy new year seems almost realized even before it has been spoken.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly; with great pleasure. I will be glad to have his addition to this song of prosperity.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I shall be pleased to contribute, Mr. Chairman. One of the delights of congressional life is the opportunity occasionally of hearing this glowing tribute to the prosperity of Texas, by my friend from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL]. I want to say to him, however——

Mr. BOUTELL. "The gentleman from Illinois" does not wish to be discourteous, and would gladly yield, but I am admonished by the chairman of this committee that my time is very rapidly running out.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, just a moment. I want to say to the gentleman that he can not get up a quarrel with me about the prosperity of Texas.

Mr. BOUTELL. Nor on any other subject, I hope.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Texas is prosperous, but it is despite of and not because of the Republican party.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman was not in the Hall when I began my speech.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And permit me to say that if the Government is successful in its criminal prosecution of those distinguished members of the Republican party, the constituents of the gentleman, the Big Four Beef Trust, we will be much more prosperous in Texas. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] did not hear the opening of my address when I forestalled exactly the remark which I thought somebody would make who came into the House after I got started.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BOUTELL. I will, provided it is in 1910 and not somewhere back in 1909, as the other was.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I agree that it shall be in 1910. The gentleman from Illinois has been very kind to me and I have listened to him with pleasure, and while he has discussed prosperity in Texas we would like for him to explain to this House and the country why it is that only a short while ago, in the city of Chicago, three or four hundred school children were sent to school without breakfast because their parents are poverty stricken under a Republican administration? And I would furthermore like to hear him discuss the railway strikes in the West, and the meetings held all over the United States by distressed and poverty-stricken citizens, fighting the beef trust and high prices of food products everywhere, and why the people are now groaning under high prices here in Washington City and many cities, where living has increased so enormously under a Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman from Texas will please stand up and not sit down. The gentleman has interrupted me, and now I want to ask him a question. Does the gentleman think prices are too high?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes, I will stand up and continue to do so, for I am right. He must answer and not dodge my question. Certainly I think prices are too high.

Mr. BOUTELL. What does the gentleman want to lower the price on, cotton? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted until I answer these remarks, until I have answered the questions the gentleman has asked me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me complete my answer, and you answer my question if you can.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will refrain until the gentleman from Illinois yields further.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will yield no further until I signify that I have answered the questions.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I had not completed my reply.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I have got exactly the question I hoped would be asked me. I had to take three-quarters of an hour——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But the gentleman did not get my whole answer about cotton—the short crop, present prices, and so forth.

Mr. BOUTELL. I had to take three-quarters of an hour before I got that question and now I will answer it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But there are other things besides raw cotton, cotton goods, and manufactures of cotton.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, considering my infallible good nature and my courtesy pending these interruptions, I simply have to submit a request that further interruptions will cease.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not intend to be discourteous to the gentleman, and if the gentleman from Illinois had listened to what I said he would have seen that I was not. But I am here entitled to reply to his question about cotton, and to receive that courtesy at his hands.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman seems to be so excited over the prospect of a decline in the price of cotton that he has not heard what I said. I said that, considering the courtesy with which I had taken the interruptions, and considering my limited time, and considering my well-known good nature, I did hope gentlemen on the other side of the aisle would refrain from interruption, at least while I was answering their questions, which were intended to be confusing, but the answers to which are much more confusing to the gentlemen who put them. As I was saying, I received exactly the inquiry I hoped I would, and it took three-quarters of an hour to get it from the other side of the House, until finally the gentleman from Texas, instead of enjoying and listening to this song of prosperity that comes up from his own State and from the Southland, has asked these questions relative to matters which I said it would be my pleasure to discuss at some later time, and finally wound up by saying that there were school children in Chicago going to school without their breakfasts. On the authority of Jane Addams—no one better able to answer—I say there is no truth in any such newspaper statement about Chicago school children. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He asked me if I did not hear the people of the country groaning under the burden of high prices, and with a smile of triumph on his face he prepared to sit down, but when he got up I asked him if prices were too high, and he said, immediately,

"Yes;" and, of course, the first thing that came into my mind was the great staple of Texas, and I could not help asking him if he wanted to lower the price of cotton. I could not hear what he said, on account of the deafening applause that went up from both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

Mr. BOUTELL. I decline to yield until I answer the gentleman's question. It is the same old question with which politicians have attempted to deceive the people. We shall have to meet the charge that the Payne tariff has raised prices. This charge, as I stated, has its origin in three causes—ignorance, political prejudice degenerating into partisan bigotry, and pecuniary self-interest.

Let me give you three illustrations of self-interest. A few weeks ago some lumber dealers met in a western city and said they regretfully must raise the price of common boards on account of the Payne tariff. Think of it, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen! They must raise the price from 50 cents to $1 a thousand on account of the Payne tariff! Why, we reduced the tariff on common boards 75 cents a thousand, and these men meet in convention and attempt to deceive and bunco and hoodwink the people and tell them that on account of the Payne tariff they have got to raise the price of common boards $1 a thousand. When any man puts that up to you, ask him this conundrum: If the lumber dealers have to raise the price a dollar a thousand when we reduce the duties 75 cents a thousand, how much will they have to raise the price when we put lumber on the free list? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, it was the same way in reference to hides. We were told that the price of hides would come down if we would put hides on the free list, and that then the price of shoes would be reduced. I have here Dun's Review of last week, giving the wholesale prices in New York of all staple commodities, and all kinds of shoes have gone up in the wholesale market—not one reduction quoted in Dun's. One of the ablest writers in the United States on economic subjects, in his letter to the Record-Herald and other papers last September, said that the Payne tariff law was the best and most scientifically adjusted tariff law that had ever been passed.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELL. Then he calls attention to the fact that the woolen dealers had got together and said they must raise the price of wool on account of the Payne tariff——

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. He then goes on to say that that is a trick that was attempted under the McKinley law in the same way. There is not in the Payne Act one change made in the wool or woolen schedule except two minor ones, and both of those were reductions. I give these three illustrations of how men who had pecuniary self-interests at stake are going to attempt to discredit the Payne tariff law, and I say to you gentlemen—and I am very sure that I am facing men on the other side of the House who will agree with me—that that sort of criticism, that attempt to discredit a statute law of our common country for base, selfish, pecuniary gain is little short of moral treason. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I said that there was a second cause for the charge that the Payne tariff had been the cause of rising prices, and that was political prejudice, often degenerating into partisan bitterness or even partisan bigotry. I hope, I sincerely trust, that in the discussions of this tariff act there will be none of that feeling exhibited upon the other side of the House.

My friends, do not join these selfish traders in trying to make the country believe that the Payne tariff law is responsible for that for which the Payne tariff is no more responsible than the changes of the moon. As I have said I hope to discuss the relation of the tariff to prices somewhat fully at a later date, now I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] on this subject of prices, how are you going to have high priced cotton and low-priced prints; how are you going to have high-priced wheat and low-priced flour; how are you going to have high-priced oats and low-priced porridge; how are you going to have high-priced corn and low-priced johnnycake; how are you going to have high-priced wool and low-priced woolens; how are you going to have high-priced cane and low-priced sugar; how are you going to have high-priced cattle and low-priced beef; how are you going to have high-priced hogs and low-priced hams? You gentlemen who attack the Payne tariff law and say that it has raised prices have got to pick out the articles affected by the tariff that have been raised in price owing to increases of duty before you can show that any alteration in the price is made by the tariff, and then you have got to be sure in complaining of high prices that you do not condemn the very high prices on which your prosperity depends.

Mr. Chairman, this subject of final retail prices to the ultimate consumer is one which I shall give myself the pleasure of discussing at some later date during this session, and I simply throw out these present suggestions to bring about further discussion of this important question.

Now, let me continue my subject, Mr. Chairman, without further interruption. Remember, what I am speaking about is this: Not that the Payne tariff law has brought additional prosperity, but I am addressing myself to the text as given in the address of the gentleman from Texas, that the Payne tariff law is not making anybody groan under the burdens which they are bearing. I am going to insert here in the RECORD, as showing what has taken place in the South, a table from the Manufacturers' Record, a southern weekly journal, published in the southern city of Baltimore. I may say in passing that this journal gives from time to time the most interesting and exhaustive accounts of the progress of agriculture and commerce in the South. If a man will read the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, and the Southern Planter, of Richmond, he can tell all about what is going on in the South, and it is a song of prosperity which this journal sings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] how much further time he would like to have yielded?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee has half an hour at his disposal, I will be glad to use it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think, in justice to others, the best I can do is to yield the gentleman twenty minutes more.

Mr. BOUTELL. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for twenty minutes more.

Mr. BOUTELL. And I want to say to the chairman and to the gentlemen of the House that I would have completed my own remarks if it had not been for these additions to the song of prosperity which have come from the other side of the Chamber.

This Manufacturers' Record publishes what is called the "Annual Blue Book of Southern Progress," and the table that I would like to put in the RECORD is on the first page and called "an inventory of southern progress and prospects." It is a comparison of conditions in the South in 1900 with what they are in 1910. Let me just read a few figures there to show the character——

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman declines to yield further solely and only on account of the shortness of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. BOUTELL. The South in manufactures has increased from $1,153,000,000 in 1900 to $2,214,000,000 in 1910. The cotton mills have a capital invested of $299,000,000, as against $183,000,000; 11,000,000 spindles, as against 4,000,000; 244,000 looms, as against 112,000; 1,300,000,000 pounds of cotton used, as against 744,000,000. The Manufacturers' Record of January 6, 1910, publishes a most interesting and instructive table giving fifty years of southern progress, comparing the conditions in the South in 1860 with the conditions of 1910 and showing the increase in the South as compared with the increase of the whole country, and I will put that table in the RECORD. In other numbers of this interesting journal are letters from all over the southern country showing conditions not only in the rural districts, but in the manufactures that are springing up in the South, and in closing my remarks I want to call attention to the wonderful series of letters that begin in the number of the Manufacturers' Record bearing date of January 27, 1910. The editor of this journal wrote to bankers throughout the entire South and the States of Missouri and Oklahoma. Those letters are printed in this issue. The States are printed in alphabetical order, beginning with Alabama, and the story that they all tell is one of increasing prosperity, advancing land values, and augmented bank balances.

I will insert all these letters in the RECORD in full.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BOUTELL. With pleasure, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and the only gentleman on this side who has asked me to yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. For a very brief question, by way of supplementing the gentleman's remarks a few moments ago as to the rise of prices. My attention was called to this because I happen at the moment to be occupying the desk of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], and I observed a report of a bill which passed the House to allow a certain Indian school to spend an additional amount of money for the purchase of cast-iron pipe. I remember that the gentleman from South Dakota said that one of the reasons for the necessity of the passage of that bill was that cast-iron pipe was rising in price.

I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois what the Payne law did with respect to the duty on cast-iron pipe?

Mr. BOUTELL. The cast-iron pipe was lower under the Dingley law than under the Wilson bill, and is lower under the Payne law than under the Dingley law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think, if I remember correctly, the Payne bill reduced the duty on cast-iron pipe 50 per cent.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman must decline to yield, and only gave way to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] as a colleague on the committee dealing with the subject which is now under discussion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask permission to insert in the RECORD other articles and other letters from all over the southern country which bear unanimous testimony to the proposition that I made, the simple proposition, and the first proposition to be met in discussing this tariff, namely, that the Payne tariff law has not burdened the United States. And I have taken that section of the country which the opponents of the bill say would be most burdened by it, that section of the country which the opponents of the protective principle have always said would be most burdened by putting a protective tariff law into effect.

Later on, as I have said, I shall be glad to take up the other subjects which we will have to meet and discuss in this campaign. I think now I have made it clear that in the agricultural districts of this country, particularly in the South and the Southwest, there is prosperity such as was never seen there before.

And I must close with this observation. I would like to say to those on this side of the House who voted against the Payne tariff act, that that act will abundantly justify itself. No tariff act can satisfy everybody. It can not be a perfect law in the estimation of any individual, but the Republican party, that was responsible for the Dingley tariff, the financial act of March 14, 1900, and the Payne tariff act, is not the party of reaction. It is, if I may give it the name, the party of realism. It is the party that sees the necessities of the country as they are, knowing that from duties on imposts must come about $350,000,000 of revenue, the party that takes the law on the statute books and carefully and honestly endeavors to make that law meet modern conditions. This has always been the record of the Republican party; the devotion to meeting and dealing with things as they are, not wasting and frittering time away in high-spun theories which never come to realization, but in doing that which the country expects us to do, doing that which the majority of the people send us here to do, namely, to raise $350,000,000 of revenue in the best way we could out of duties on imports and at the same time confer the maximum of good upon all the people and do a minimum of ill. That I think is the doctrine of enlightened realism.

So, let me say to those gentlemen who voted against the Payne Act, study it carefully, study it outside of the mere schedules. Read what the head of our party said about this law. Study its effect in the country, as I have tried seriously to do this morning with all the lightness and good nature that we could interject into a dry tariff discussion. Study it in the light of the history of the past, and you will see that the protective principle brought to the Southland just what was dearest to McKinley's heart, the prosperity which that section needed to bring it back into closer union and harmony with all the country. Read this Payne tariff act in the light of our future necessities, and then I think you gentlemen, by whatever title outsiders may call you, will rejoice and be glad that you are Republicans, will rejoice and be glad that we were right and you were mistaken, will rejoice and be glad and be proud of President Taft that he was the first one to come out, after this act had been put upon the statute books, with his approval of it as the best tariff law that had ever been passed. [Applause on the Republican side.] Look at it in that light, my friends who voted against it, and I am sure you will be glad to find that you were wrong. I am sure you will be generous and courageous enough to admit it. And then you will be glad that we were right in passing just such a law as we did.

And to my friends on the other side of the House who are going to talk about the burdens of the high prices, you rejoice and be glad of the prosperity which has come to the beautiful Southland, to every county in it, and in the language of that eloquent and wide-awake Texas editor, "Adjust your perspective to the prospect," for the prospect is one of hope and radiant prosperity and of the future triumphs of the Republican party. So quit groaning and adjust your perspective to the prospect. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX A.

SOUTHERN BANKERS TELL OF FARMERS' PROSPERITY.

[Written for the Manufacturers' Record.]

One of the clearest and most comprehensive surveys of the condition of farmers in the fourteen Southern States and in Oklahoma and Missouri ever presented is given in the following eight pages of brief letters from bankers, mainly in county seats of those States. It is a survey of abounding prosperity. In close touch with agricultural communities and vitally interested in all that concerns their welfare, the bankers are in an excellent position to measure things as they are. A sure index is the amount of deposits belonging to the farmers in the banks. Throughout the South generally there has been a marked increase of money to the credit of farmers in the banks during the past few years. For example, in one West Virginia city the deposits have increased in ten years from $225,000 in two banks to $750,000 in three banks. They are 50 per cent greater at Charlotte, N. C., than they were five years ago, and about 20 per cent greater at points in Missouri. A Mississippi banker notes that the betterment in this respect has come to small farmers particularly. Danville, Ky., reports the largest deposits in the history of the five banks of the county; the Virginia Peninsula about three times what they were fifteen years ago.

At some points the increased cost of living and a part failure of the feed crops have checked the tendency to an increase in deposits, but at other points the very fact of higher prices has more than compensated the farmers for the shortage due to drouth or other causes. Another cultivator of deposits is the increasing tendency of farmers to "live at home," as voluntarily in a realization of the uncertainty of single-crop methods, or through the species of compulsion on account of the boll weevil in Texas and Louisiana, especially, they have entered upon a period of diversification.

The prosperity of southern farmers is shown, however, in other ways, promising even greater things for the future. Old debts have been paid off, mortgages have been lifted, and former debtors are now creditors. Sometimes, under the spur of retail merchants insisting upon a cash basis of trade, they are becoming more economical and more careful about machinery and implements. Those with a surplus are investing in other lands, in finer grades of stock, in new houses and barns, in improved machinery, in more mules, in wire fencing, in clearing new lands, in local building associations, or in county bonds. There is comparatively little unwise speculation, save here and there, as in West Virginia, where some of the money derived from the sale of coal lands or from the granting of oil and gas privileges is not only sending farmers to town, but making victims of "gold-mining stocks;" or, in Tennessee and Oklahoma, where the run at some points seems to be toward doubtful life insurance and fire insurance schemes; or in Georgia, where cotton futures seem to have some slight call.

Permanent investments in land have meantime increased in value, according to location or other circumstances, and they range from 15 per cent in Kentucky and 25 per cent in South Carolina to 50 per cent in portions of Missouri, where wet lands have been reclaimed, and from 100 to 30 per cent in portions of Arkansas and Texas. Better roads and better schools, convenient telephone communication and more intelligent farming have contributed to this end; but another factor has been the trend of immigration from other parts of the country, most notably in Texas and Florida, but also having some effect in the trucking regions of Maryland and the Carolinas, in Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, and, of course, Oklahoma, with its virgin soils.

Taken as a whole, the situation is most satisfactory to every man interested in the welfare of the South. The danger in the situation is suggested in the following from a leading Georgia banker:

"I am only afraid that the wave of prosperity which has struck the South will cause a reckless spirit to abound and make our people undertake more than they can safely manage. Unusual prosperity is not best for any section, unless it continues long enough for the people to accustom themselves to it and to learn how to regulate their business affairs in the midst of good times. If the farmers of Georgia and the South will only keep their heads and be conservative in these prosperous times, not buying too much land or planting too much cotton, and if the merchants will not undertake to sell too many goods on credit and buy too much on time, I see nothing in the way of our having the best times in Georgia and the South that we have had in ten years."

The letters follow:

ALABAMA.

BIRMINGHAM.

W. P. G. Harding, president First National Bank, Birmingham, Ala.: "I regard the present business and financial outlook as sound and promising. The farmers and merchants are generally in good condition. Real estate values in cities are firm, and values of farm and mineral lands show an advancing tendency. No unusual influx of settlers or investors is apparent yet, but a considerable movement in this direction is anticipated in the spring. There is more continued cold weather this winter than usual."

DECATUR.

First National Bank, Decatur, Ala.: "General financial conditions look better than for several years. Farm lands have increased in value within the last year 25 per cent. We frequently have new settlers and investors locating in this vicinity. The extensive Louisville and Nashville Railroad shops are running on full time, employing a large force, and the American Tanning Company has recently resumed operations. The only drawback to farmers is the scarcity of fine stuff and the exorbitant high price for mules and all farm supplies."

TALLADEGA.

J. C. Bowie, vice-president Talladega National Bank, Talladega, Ala.:

"High prices for cotton more than offset the shortness in the cotton and corn crop in this section. More intelligent farming, better roads and schools, and free telephone communications are greatly adding to farm values. Mercantile interests are improving. Settlers from other sections are locating here, but not in great numbers. Our manufacturing industries, principally in cotton yarns, are doing well. The ability of this soil to produce so many of the essentials in good quantities is sure to attract desirable settlers. Altogether, the outlook is quite attractive."

MOBILE.

City Bank and Trust Company, Mobile, Ala.:

"Business and financial conditions generally are showing noticeable improvement. Merchants report business better and conditions good. Manufacturing interests have practically gotten back to normal. The lumber business is improving, and prices have shown a steady advance for the past six months. Farm and real estate values are better, and there is more inquiry at increasing values. A large number of investors are buying country lands in Mobile and Baldwin County, adjoining us. Large plantings in fruits, oranges, and grapes and other semitropical products. This city's financial condition is the best since the war."

ARKANSAS.

BENTON.

E. S. Rodman, cashier First National Bank, Benton, Ark.:

"The farmers in this immediate vicinity, as a rule, are in debt less than ever before, and the business outlook for the coming year is good. We have a good, steady growth here, and the value of farms is increasing each year."

BERRYVILLE.

D. J. West, vice-president Carroll County Bank, Berryville, Ark.:

"On account of the resources of this country being opened up by the building of the Missouri and North Arkansas Railroad and the immigration from other States, the deposits of the farmers in this county are at least ten times what they were fifteen years ago, and at least twice what they were five years ago. The value of farm lands has about doubled in the last twenty years, and there is more demand for land now and at better price than ever before."

LITTLE ROCK.

Charles McKee, vice-president State National Bank, Little Rock, Ark.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in the vicinity of Little Rock is probably better than at any time in the past. A short crop of cotton was made up to the farmers in the high price. The deposits by farmers in local banks have been on the increase for many years, and we should say that the bank deposits of farmers have doubled during the past five years. The outlook for all kinds of business for this year is good.

"During the past six years there has been some disposition in this section to make investments in wild-cat enterprises both in and outside of the South. However, we believe this is at an end.

"The value of farm lands in Arkansas has materially increased, and the price of good lands has steadily advanced. Arkansas lands in general have been very, very low, and are still, compared with similar lands of other States. A large amount of money has been invested in Arkansas lands during the past year, especially in rice and timber lands. Settlers are looking this way. The steady growth and improvement of our cities, farms, manufactories, and mines is most gratifying to the business men of this State."

MARIANNA.

W. P. Weld, cashier Lee County Bank, Marianna, Ark.:

"The farmers in our vicinity are in much better condition than in former years, their deposits in local banks running at least 50 to 75 per cent larger than some few years ago. The general business outlook is fair, the surplus money from cotton and other crops being used in local developments rather than enterprises outside of the county and State. Values of farm lands have increased in the last five years from 100 to 300 per cent, and settlers are beginning to come from the Northern States, especially from Illinois and Indiana, and are investing heavily in real estate in this section. We have in this (Lee) county thousands of acres of very fine timber growing upon the alluvial Mississippi and St. Francis River bottom lands, while west of Marianna, the county seat, some 10 or 12 miles, begins the wonderful new rice development of this country. Would pay you to give special attention to the rice industry, and if you desire I can have an article prepared by perfectly reliable parties which will open the eyes of the people in the older section of the country as to the immense possibilities of this business."

PARIS.

W. R. Cherry, cashier Bank of Paris, Paris, Ark.:

"In the main the country is prosperous, yet there are a great many shiftless people who are hard pressed, and the very high cost of living is sorely felt by this class, while individual farmers are growing wealthier and they are accumulating some little surplus of money, and the banks hold better deposits than was held a few years ago. This is due to two causes—the increase of surplus cash and the more general use of banks. There has been an upward tendency in both real estate and live stock of every description. There is a slow, steady growth in population, but nothing spasmodic. There is no surplus of cash to be diverted into wild-cat investments, as there is good demand at fair rates at home. This is purely an agricultural country, and the thrifty, industrious farmer is doing well."

PINE BLUFF.

M. E. Bloom, cashier the Citizens' Bank, Pine Bluff, Ark.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in this section is more healthy than in several years past. Our section practically produces nothing but cotton, and the short production in the cotton States, resulting in the high price of the product, and the producers taking advantage and selling on the high market reaped the benefit at the right time. The general business outlook, as well as industrial, is very flattering indeed. Our city is improving in the way of better buildings, and the condition of our local merchants is above the average. Farm lands in this section are in demand at good prices, and there have been some good sales recently. The cotton land, producing from three-fourths to a bale per acre, lying in districts above overflows, sells readily for $50 to $75 per acre. I am not advised in reference to any new settlers coming into this section recently."

SHERIDAN.

Phil T. Lewis, cashier Grant County Bank, Sheridan, Ark.:

"Grant County is comparatively a timber county, though being settled with a few farmers at almost all parts of it. The farmers, taking them as a class, are cotton and corn raisers, occasionally varying toward live stock, and their financial condition is better than at any former time, a great number of them being able to take care of themselves with their own resources. Our bank is carrying the account of quite a number of farmers, and their balances the past two years have shown material increases, and it is conservative to say that their bank balances in comparison with five years ago exceed themselves by 50 per cent, and their home comforts show a decided improvement. They seem to feel good, and very few have the moving fever. We are beginning to sell farms to out-of-State settlers, and in course of a short time hope to be able to interest more with the cut-over timber lands, lots of which will make good farms, and can be bought at reasonable prices."

WARREN.

S. B. Meek, president Warren Bank, Warren, Ark.:

"The financial condition of farmers is much better than for a few years back, and are less in debt. Would say between 25 and 50 per cent better than five years ago. Farm lands have improved in value, and surplus money is being invested in lands. Lands have increased at least 50 per cent, and we still have the cheapest land under the sun."

FLORIDA.

OCALA.

Z. C. Chambliss, vice-president the Monroe & Chambliss Bank, Ocala, Fla.:

"The farmers in this section are in better condition than they were five years ago, and are doing more business with local banks, although their deposits now are not so large as they were during the early part of 1907. Business is brisk, though there is but little cotton raised in this section. There has been a substantial increase in the value of all classes of lands during the past twelve months, approximating perhaps 75 to 100 per cent.

"Swarms of settlers and investors are coming into this immediate section, principally on account of the sensational advertising of some Chicago and Fort Wayne land-booming companies. We think that a great many of these people will be disappointed, but that a great many really substantial citizens will be gained. Many of the people coming seem to have believed everything which they have seen covering all extremes of crops and productions, taking the extremes as an average. They think cocoanuts and corn grow on the same land at the same time, whereas one is produced in the extreme southern end of the State and the other in the central and northern, which are perhaps 500 miles apart. We have all kinds of soil and climate, and there are many very fine opportunities here, and we are encouraging that class of people who want to come among us to do things, and not expect to find money growing on trees."

PERRY.

W. L. Weaver, cashier First National Bank, Perry, Fla.:

"The farmers are in a fairly prosperous condition in this county. They met their obligations more promptly during the past fall than they have in the history of our institution. We have only a small number of farmers in our county, but what few we have who try are doing well and have money in the banks. They are using their surplus money in improving their farms, putting up wire fencing in place of the old rail fences, and building good, comfortable homes, etc.

"This county is almost a solid belt of round yellow-pine timber that is just beginning to be manufactured, and there is but very little land open to cultivation. There are no new settlers or investors in farm lands coming into this vicinity at present, but we think it due to a lack of advertising the value of the farm lands here and the fact that so little of it is open for cultivation. There has been an advance in farm lands within the past twelve months of at least 25 per cent."

MARIANNA.

W. H. Milton, president the First National Bank, Marianna, Fla.:

"The farmers of this vicinity are in better condition than they have been in the past two or three years; still crops were comparatively short in 1909, but the increased price of cotton more than offset the smallness of the crop. There are more farmers carrying deposits in banks than there were five years ago. I have not had time to examine the matter sufficiently to give the percentage of increase. The general business and industrial outlook is much better than it has been for some time. I do not think that the farmers will take much stock in speculation enterprises.

"Land values have increased considerably more than 10 per cent within the last year. There are new settlers coming in from other sections. In this part of the State they are coming principally from Georgia and Alabama, though we receive quite a number of letters in regard to land from people in the Northern and Western States, and I think some few sales are being made to them. This portion of Florida is strictly an agricultural, timber, and turpentine section, and this county's principal money crop is cotton. This is not generally known among prospective immigrants from Northern States, and usually those who write about land are prospective fruit growers, and for this reason I think the immigration to western Florida is less than it should be, as most of the farmers, i. e., of staple farm crops, usually write to other parts of the South, and farm lands here, which are really as fertile and sell at a less price, are principally known only to immigrants from near-by States like Georgia and Alabama, and a great many of them are buying lands in this section and moving on them."

ST. AUGUSTINE.

G. B. Lamar, vice-president and cashier the First National Bank, St. Augustine, Fla.:

"In our immediate vicinity (that is, St. Johns County, the business of which section is tributary to this town) the financial condition of the farmers is much improved over last year. The Irish potato crop, which is the principal staple raised for the market, was bountiful and sold at excellent prices. The result has been a considerable increase in the acreage, which will amount to possibly in this county and the adjoining county 50 per cent. This and the exploitation of farming lands throughout the county, which epidemic has reached us some months since, has given inflated value to all lands the least desirable for farming operations.

"On the other hand, the surplus from the result of last year's crop has been used almost altogether in the betterment of their original holdings or in acquiring additional desirable land.

"In our immediate vicinity there has been a similar influx of new farmers of a very desirable type, and in territory somewhat beyond what we consider our immediate province many thousands of acres have been sold at prices far exceeding their present legitimate value to persons reputed to be desirable and who intend to make this section their home. The general conditions in this city are healthy and the outlook promising."

GEORGIA.

JESUP.

D. M. Parker, cashier Jesup Banking Company, Jesup, Ga.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in this section has not been better in years, if ever, than at the present time. The good prices received for their cotton has made the majority of them independent. They have harvested good crops of corn, hay, etc., and have considerable meat stored away or ready to kill. The deposits of the two banks here have never in their history recorded as much on deposit as at this time. They have at least 25 per cent more than they have ever shown before.

"The outlook for the coming year is very good. The farmers are raising more horses, but are buying more mules than in several years. They are using their money on farm improvements in the way of wire fences, new buggies and wagons, up-to-date farming implements, better cattle, clearing new lands, etc. Lands have more than doubled in price in the last ten years, and within the last twelve months there has been a tendency to higher prices, we should say from 10 to 20 per cent. A few new settlers are coming in, and desirable ones are wanted. Lands easy to clear and cultivate, and produce good crops first year under cultivation. Large tracts are for sale at reasonable prices."

LAGRANGE.

J. E. Dunson, president the Lagrange Banking and Trust Company, Lagrange, Ga.:

"The farmers of our community are in better condition as an average than for several years. While some of them are yet in debt by reason of the fact the crop was very spotted, taken as a whole, their condition is much improved. They are carrying at least 100 per cent more deposits than at the same period five years ago.

"As to the general outlook, it is fairly good. The high price of food products and the failure to a certain extent of feed crops will necessitate an investment of a large part of the surplus in that direction, but as to wild-cat schemes, I think the time has passed when the conservative farmers of the South can be led off with such schemes. There has been an advance of farm lands from 25 to 100 per cent; an average of 33⅓ to 40 per cent would appear to be about right. There are no investors or settlers coming into our section from elsewhere at present. Taken as a whole, conditions are satisfactory, and if the price of cotton continues remunerative, as at present, farm lands will continue to increase and every department of business as well."

SANDERSVILLE.

Banking house of Louis Cohen, Sandersville, Ga.:

"Financial conditions of our farmers are a shade better, and in better condition; not as much in debt. Deposits compared with average five years is more than double.

"Business outlook seems good for banks; as to industrial outlook, have nothing of the kind in our county worth mentioning. What surplus money the farmers have will be used almost exclusively on their farms. Fortunately, we have no farmers investing in wild-cat or speculative ventures.

"Our farm lands in this county have materially advanced in price per acre. Would consider the advance within the past twelve months to be fully 25 per cent."

SAVANNAH.

Mills B. Lane, president the Citizens' and Southern Bank, Savannah, Ga.:

"The farming interest in Georgia is now in better shape than it has been since the war between the States; in fact, it is the first time that the farmers to any great extent have been able to pay up in full and carry balances in bank; of course, there have been exceptions to this, but the bulk of them have been constantly in debt for the past forty-five years.

"All lines of business seem to be prosperous, and the money derived from cotton and other crops seems to be used in investing in local securities and developing farm properties, and not invested in wild-cat enterprises outside of the South. There are, however, a few cases where parties are speculating in cotton futures, and, of course, they will meet the usual result."

QUITMAN.

The Bank of Quitman, Quitman, Ga.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in Brooks County is very good. While some may owe money, others have substantial deposit accounts, and most of the obligations are for current necessities, and are retired in the early fall. We can not give you any near estimate of the increase in deposits in five years of the farmers' accounts, as we do not separate them by occupation, but the debts are greatly reduced and deposits increased very much during that time. I think a safe estimate for the past five years in the financial improvement in the farmers' conditions is 35 to 50 per cent.

"The business outlook is good. Farmers, as a rule, do not invest in securities or take stock in wild-cat enterprises. They buy more land, and still more land. Some of them, of course, take stock in local institutions—banks, cotton mills, etc., where they know the people who are to operate them, but the great bulk of their savings go back in land, stock, and improvements. Farm lands are higher—from 10 to 15 per cent on average.

"Some settlers are moving in here from North Georgia and buying small farms. The lands are cheaper, more easily cultivated, and thus more profitable. The newcomers are welcomed, and we have room for a great many more good, substantial farmers in this section."

SPARTA.

John D. Walker, president and financial agent Walker Banks, Sparta, Ga.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in this vicinity is first class on the whole. They are less in debt than in former years, and, in fact, some farmers have paid out of debt this fall who have been trying to get out for four or five years. They are carrying their surplus funds in local banks, and their deposits, in my opinion, are at least 50 per cent better than five years ago.

"The general business and industrial outlook is very favorable, and I am only afraid that the wave of prosperity which has struck the South will cause a reckless spirit to abound and make our people undertake more than they can safely manage. Unusual prosperity is not best for any section unless it continues long enough for the people to accustom themselves to it and to learn how to regulate their business affairs in the midst of good times. If the farmers of Georgia and the South will only keep their heads and be conservative in the midst of these prosperous times, and not buy too much land or plant too much cotton, and the merchants will not undertake to sell too many goods on credit and buy too much on time, I see nothing in the way of our having the best times in Georgia and the South that we have had in ten years.

"The effect of high-priced cotton in this section is to enhance the value of land, for whenever money is plentiful land values go up. More land has been sold this fall in this vicinity than in several years.

"In a general way, I should say that our people were never in better shape nor the future brighter with hope than at the present time."

SUMMERVILLE.

N. K. Bitting, cashier Bank of Commerce, Summerville, Ga.:

"Notwithstanding our having had a severe hailstorm in this county in November, which proved very disastrous to our cotton crop, our farmers are less in debt than for years; deposits from farmers are larger than at any previous time.

"Business outlook is very promising. Our farmers do not speculate in any sense, but are using their money to improve their farms, both in buildings and fertilizers. Prices of farm lands have advanced about 10 per cent within the past twelve months. The increase has been brought about largely by recent business improvement. Within the past two or three years we have had quite a number of settlers from other sections, principally Ohio, Illinois, Texas, and the West."

VALDOSTA.

J. F. Lewis, president the Citizens' Bank of Valdosta, Valdosta, Ga.:

"The farmers in our section are in better financial condition this year and less in debt than in former years. Their deposits are fully as much or more than ever before. The industrial outlook is better than ever before. Their surplus money, however, is being used to improve homes and for development work. Farm lands have advanced in value from 25 to 50 per cent. Some few settlers and visitors have come to our section."

KENTUCKY.

DANVILLE.

J. A. Quisenberry, cashier the Citizens' National Bank, Danville, Ky.:

"The financial condition of the farmers of this section is better than it has ever before been. High price of tobacco and farm products and live stock have put them in fine fix. On January 1, 1910, there was on deposit in the five banks in this county $1,245,691.46, and of this amount there was on that date in the three banks in this city $1,095,691.46. This is the largest deposits the banks have ever had in their entire history. As a result, the farmers are less in debt than ever before, and their financial condition, as a rule, is good.

"The general business and industrial outlook is good, especially if we can get some legislation through our present legislature upon the matter of methods of taxation, whereby capital will be invited to come into our State, instead of being driven out, as it has been for some years past.

"The surplus money from the crops will be invested in other lands, stock and improvements, partially, and some of it will doubtless go into questionable investments. This section of our State is almost entirely agricultural, and too little of a manufacturing section; consequently we do not have that avenue for investment of capital.

"Lands in this section have advanced a good deal—say, perhaps, 15 per cent in the past year. We have a steady demand for good lands, but the buyers, as a rule, are not from the outside of the State, but come from our mountain sections, where they have sold mineral lands and want to invest in better farming lands than the mountains afford. In the past eighteen months we have had a considerable increase in our population, largely due to the fact that the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company (now operated by the Southern Railway) has made this city an end of its first division out of Cincinnati, and the further fact that this community has this year developed into quite a large loose-leaf tobacco market. This has stimulated the growth of tobacco, and we look for about 100 per cent increase in the acreage for the coming season of 1910."

CLINTON.

C. V. Heaslet, cashier the First National Bank, Clinton, Ky.:

"An intimate connection during the past eight years I have been in the banking business in this (Hickman) county leads me to say that the financial conditions are very much better at the beginning of this year than at any time for the past eight years in this, a truly agricultural country. There has been made just a beginning of the intensive methods of farming, and the idea is spreading and spreading as the success of it is noted by the surrounding neighbors. Crop rotation is being more carefully and systematically done, and grain crops are being used for feeding live stock upon the lands, producing the grain to an extent never known before.

"Again, in the retail business done by merchants the cash system is rapidly being adopted, and is a very potent factor in preventing the purchase of articles not necessary, and is causing the people to take reasonable care of machinery that formerly was left in the open weather when crops were harvested, as frequently, under former conditions, the owner of this or that piece of machinery would be struggling to pay notes executed for the purchase price long after the machine had been thrown in the scrap heap.

"Our people are more generally doing a banking business than in the years past, and there is an independence and satisfaction felt by a man with money in the bank not known to the individual without it.

"The price of farming lands has advanced something like 25 per cent upon land within reach of speedy marketing in the past six or seven years, and while there has been no marked immigration into this section, yet many farmers have, one by one, found better lands here at cheaper prices than in their former homes, and in that way have assisted in bringing in advanced methods of agriculture as practiced in sections of high-priced lands.

"There is a spirit of optimism prevailing here, and the dawn of still greater activity and prosperity is breaking. Education of the youth to present higher standards will fit them for that better appreciation of the natural resources and advantages so lavishly distributed over this western portion of Kentucky, widely known as the 'Penny-rile' district of Kentucky."

LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS.

Sol Wexler, vice-president Whitney-Central National Bank, New Orleans, La.:

"The financial condition of the farmers of this vicinity is, in my opinion, better than it has been for a great many years. Not only has their credit been restricted in order to enforce a more general diversification of crops, but there has been a general disposition on the part of farmers to live more nearly at home and to use their credit to a lesser extent. The best evidence that they have a large surplus of cash is the fact that local banks in this vicinity have larger balances in the hands of their depositaries than at any time during the past five years.

"The general business and industrial outlook is unusually promising. I believe that the funds will remain in this section of the country, and will be kept more or less in liquid form, rather than for investment or development work of any kind, either here or elsewhere.

"There is a growing increase in immigration into this section of the country and considerable inquiries for farm lands coming from western farmers, and I believe that our farming lands at the present time are probably selling at the lowest price we shall see them for many years to come. There has not been an advance in the last twelve months, but rather a decline, owing to the prevalence of the pest known as 'boll weevil,' and during the interim, in which a general change of farming methods will take place, there has been a process of elimination of such farmers as are unable to adjust themselves to more general diversification of crops and new conditions."

SHREVEPORT.

P. Youree, president Commercial National Bank of Shreveport, Shreveport, La.:

"The financial conditions of the farmers in our vicinity are much better than they have been for the past two or three years. They are less in debt and have more surplus than they have had in some time; the deposits compare favorable with five years ago; in fact, are much better than they were five years ago.

"The general business and industrial outlook in this vicinity is good. I do not think there will be any surplus money invested other than locally here. There have been some speculative or 'wild-cat' enterprises this year in way of cotton futures, but these were confined to the people who gamble in that way every year.

"While the boll weevil has affected the value of farm lands in this section of the country, yet the improvement and the betterment of farm conditions is very great. There has been no advance in the value of farm lands during the past year.

"We have a few settlers and investors from other sections of the country coming into this immediate section the past year. That seems to be the trouble with this part of the country. If we could get immigrants of good Swede or German stock, or Illinois farmers, we think this would be the greatest country on earth. When you consider that we can raise everything that is raised on lands, and the South has the monopoly on the cotton crop, and the State of Louisiana furnishes about 80 per cent of the sulphur of the world, with inexhaustible salt mines, and more virgin timber than any other State, and more alluvial land than any State; that more corn and as much alfalfa can be raised here than in any section of the United States, then you can not but recommend people to move to this country. I am pleased, indeed, to answer your questions."

WINNFIELD.

H. T. Pye, president Bank of Winnfield, Winnfield, La.:

"The financial condition of the farmers here is good. Very few in debt, and at least 95 per cent carry bank accounts, compared with about 25 per cent five years ago. General business outlook is good; very little local capital invested outside immediate territory. Immigrants are beginning to settle on the cut-over lands, and more attention being given diversified farming."

MARYLAND.

ANNAPOLIS.

J. Wirt Randall, president the Farmers' National Bank, Annapolis, Md.:

"In response to your circular of inquiry I will briefly state the situation in this portion of Maryland—Anne Arundel County. The farmers have not had a good year in 1909; the drought was general and most pronounced through the later summer and the autumn. The upper half of our county is given up almost exclusively to raising fruit and vegetables for market, and the drought was particularly severe upon them. What was raised, however, particularly in the way of grain, hay, etc., commanded good prices, and some made unusually large profits. The deposits in our local banks compare very favorably with prior years, and emphatically so compared with the period of five years ago. This increase is particularly in the savings banks and savings departments of the other banks, indicating a more general habit of saving than ever before.

"The city of Annapolis itself is steadily improving in development of all kinds, and is experiencing a boom as a 'residential city.' Since the final settlement of the queston whether the Naval Academy will be permanently located in Annapolis many people connected with the navy, officers and employees, have been making it their fixed home. The electrifying of the railroads between Baltimore and Washington and Annapolis has also given a stimulus to subdivisions of farms and the building up of suburban residences near the lines of these roads. Waterfront property is being appreciated as never before in this section, and values have been going up by leaps and bounds. For the past five or six years very many handsome residences and attractive villas have been building along the Severn and other rivers and the bay fronts of Anne Arundel County, and land companies and development companies are being formed constantly to buy up and subdivide such properties. The result is very favorable to the business and industrial outlook of this part of the State, as many settlers and men of means from other sections are coming into it.

"The northern portion of the county, between Annapolis and Baltimore, and the western portion, along the line of the Washington, Baltimore and Annapolis electric road, are receiving many foreigners, who are buying up small tracts of land and illustrating the advantages of 'intensive cultivation.' They are largely from Eastern Europe—Hungarians, Bohemians, Lithuanians, Russians, etc.—and seem a very industrious class of people. There are several also from the northwestern portion of the Dominion of Canada who have become tired of the long winters there prevailing and have sold out there and bought land in Anne Arundel County. They predict that there will be quite a movement of that sort in the near future."

OAKLAND.

R. E. Sliger, cashier First National Bank, Oakland, Md.:

"Regarding the general business conditions of our community, I must say that there has been a great improvement in the last few years, and particularly in the case of the farmer. While Garrett is the largest county in the State it is also the youngest, and not so thickly settled as the older counties. Up to within the last few years it has had many acres of good timber land, nearly every farmer having a portion of his land covered with virgin forest. He has been able to sell this timber for enough to pay his mortgage, if he had one, and to improve the balance of the farm. This also applies to some coal that has been sold, the surface being retained. There is no tendency here to invest the surplus in 'wild-cat' enterprises, so far as I know, but it has been put back on the farm in the shape of improvements, or deposited in the savings department of the national banks. I should say that their deposits have doubled in the last five years, and in many cases the farms have more than doubled in value. Each farmer is becoming more scientific each year and getting better results from his labor. He is using improved machinery more and more, raising better crops and erecting better buildings. There are a number of cases where investors from other sections have bought land and settled here, and a farmer who is getting up in years sometimes sells his farm and moves into Oakland, the county seat. There is always a demand for residence property in Oakland, which is a delightful resort the year round and has the reputation of having a summer climate that is unsurpassed. The new state road that is now being built through each county has already increased the value of the land that is near it, and when completed will do a vast amount of good to the whole State. I look for a great improvement in the next two years."

MISSISSIPPI.

CARROLLTON.

J. R. Bingham, president Bank of Carrollton, Carrollton, Miss.:

"The condition of the farmer in this vicinity is improving somewhat. He is still in debt, as of yore, and still a borrower. Few of them have money on deposit, though their numbers increase steadily, as does the amount. The business and industrial outlook is good and grows better. Local money will be used to develop our natural resources. Our people are not inclined to go abroad for investments, and lack funds if they had the inclination. Price of farm lands has doubled within recent years, but there has been no change within twelve months. Investors and settlers from other sections do not come here."

HATTIESBURG.

F. W. Foote, vice-president First National Bank of Commerce, Hattiesburg, Miss.:

"The financial condition of the farmers of this section is very much better than heretofore. They are less in debt, and many of them are out of debt. A great many deposit with the local banks, and such deposits are considerably higher than they were five years ago. Regarding the general outlook, it appears to us that the present year should witness prosperity on the part of the people. The people of this section are more conservative, careful, energetic, and economical than heretofore, and they are consequently better managers. The value of farm land has not increased during the past year, but desirable farm land brings a good price—very much more than such land brought a few years ago. There is some immigration to this section, but not a great deal."

VICKSBURG.

B. W. Griffith, president First National Bank, Vicksburg, Miss.:

"The general condition of farmers in the territory tributary to this city is much better than for many years. Crops were somewhat short, but they were raised on a more economical plan than usual, and prices were excellent. Almost all farmers—the small farmer particularly—has money to his credit in bank. In consequence, the banks have larger deposits than ever before.

"The outlook is most hopeful. Diversified farming has become the rule instead of the exception, and very few have failed to raise sufficient foodstuffs for the coming year, thus being far more independent than formerly. Their investments are going into home industries only, and in the main such as look to farm improvements.

"Immigration is slow, and that of the best kind—sober, industrious, intelligent, and thrifty—is the one and only great need of this part of the country. Our climate and soil offer the best opportunity for such immigrants of any in my knowledge, and land—good land—is now cheaper here than it will ever be again."

MISSOURI.

CENTERVIEW, JOHNSON COUNTY.

R. C. Hull, cashier Bank of Centerview, Centerview, Mo.:

"Farmers are less in debt than five years ago, and are carrying probably 20 per cent more deposits than five years ago. The business outlook is excellent. Most of surplus will be invested at home, placed on deposit with local banks. A small per cent will get into the wild-cat schemes. Farms and homes have been improved, and land has advanced 15 per cent in twelve months, 30 per cent in five years. Investors from other sections probably bought one farm in twenty every year for the last five years. I want to qualify my answer to the first question. Some investors have bought farms at the advance and placed probably larger mortgages on farms than they ever carried before. Of course, that class is more in debt than formerly."

CLAYTON, ST. LOUIS COUNTY.

F. J. Hollocher, secretary the Trust Company of St. Louis County, Clayton, Mo.:

"The financial condition of the farmers of this vicinity is good. As a rule, they are not debtors, but are creditors, loaning their surplus funds or buying additional real estate. The deposits are larger than they were five years ago by at least 10 per cent. The general business and industrial outlook appears promising. All surplus funds from the crops of this vicinity are, as a rule, employed to develop the local territory. The value of farm lands is appreciating along with all other commodities. The advance within the last twelve months in real estate is estimated at least 10 per cent."

EDINA, KNOX COUNTY.

E. O. Parsons, cashier Knox County Savings Bank, Edina, Mo.:

"The land in this county has doubled in price in the last eight years. The loans on real estate have increased in that time in proportion to the increase of the price of land. The lands that have changed hands the last two years have been between local people. Last year was a very bad crop year in this county, but what the farmers have had to sell is bringing extremely high prices.

"There are lots of money in the banks, but we have a strong demand for loans, and interest is getting higher. In the last statement of the banks, last November, I noticed the banks had lost about $50,000 in deposits in this county in the last year. Our home people are beginning to realize that our land is not going to be any cheaper and are getting land hungry. In the last year the good class of land has advanced $10 per acre, and that by local buyers. The surplus made by the farmers is used to improve or buy more land; when not used for either it is generally loaned out on real-estate security."

KIRKSVILLE, ADAIR COUNTY.

E. Conner, assistant cashier the Citizens' National Bank, Kirksville, Mo.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in our section is far in advance of what it was in former years. They are less in debt and are carrying more surplus deposits in local banks—we would think as much as double the amount of five years ago. The general business outlook is fine. We do not think the surplus money in this section will be invested in speculative or visionary schemes. There seems to be more of a sentiment of improving property of all kinds. Farm lands have almost doubled in price here in the last five years. A great many new settlers are coming into this section from Iowa and Illinois, which is largely responsible for the increase of land values. Business in general seems to be very prosperous."

LAMAR, BARTON COUNTY.

Charles B. Edwards, cashier First National Bank, Lamar, Mo.:

"Our farmers are in very much better financial condition than for five years. I do not think that there is any material increase in deposits, but many farmers have reduced their mortgages, have their farms better improved, and a great deal more stock and other personal property. As this is a farming community we look for business generally to be good, providing prices hold up.

"I think in this community that what surplus money our people get hold of will be spent in local investments and development work. Farm conditions and improvements are very much better than they were a few years ago, and land has advanced about 25 per cent. We have had quite an immigration from Illinois, Wisconsin, and Dakota, most of whom are investing in Barton County land."

LINNEUS, LINN COUNTY.

W. P. Thorne, cashier Citizens' Bank, Linneus, Mo.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in this locality was never better. A great many farms have been sold in the last few years to men from other States that had but little to pay down on them, but the advance in the land has been on the increase, so most of them could sell with a profit. We are having a good demand for money. Our deposits have been on the increase for some time, but this is the time of year that they will decrease to some extent. Land has increased from $15 to $20 per acre in the last four or five years. I think we have a bright future if money keeps easy. Farm products of all kinds are bringing the best prices they have in years. With good crops and plenty of money this county will bloom like a rose."

MONTICELLO, LEWIS COUNTY.

G. W. Marchand, secretary Monticello Trust Company, Monticello, Mo.:

"As a general rule the farmers in this county are in a prosperous condition. They have been for the last several years reducing their indebtedness on their farms. The amount of money carried by the banks at the present time is practically double that of five years ago, and as this is a farming community it therefore means that this increase of deposit is largely due to the surplus money belonging to the farmers. The business outlook is good. Our surplus money will be used on home improvements. Our people are not inclined toward speculation. Farm lands in this community have been on the increase for several years. I do not know that there has been a special increase in the last twelve months, but there has been an increase of from 50 to 100 per cent in the last three or four years. Very few settlers or investors from other sections are coming in here. Most of the changes made in the ownership of farms have been from local sources."

PERRYVILLE, PERRY COUNTY.

Thomas L. Phillips, cashier Bank of Perryville, Perryville, Mo.:

"Farmers are doing well, getting on an average 20 per cent more for stuff this year than last. Investing their funds mostly in farm loans. No new settlers coming into the community. Things as a whole are unusually prosperous among the farmers, but the laborers are not at all satisfied with conditions and the prices they are securing for their labor."

POPLAR BLUFF, BUTLER COUNTY.

N. B. Cook, cashier Bank of Poplar Bluff, Poplar Bluff, Mo.:

"The farmers of this locality are in a much better financial condition than ever before. They have for the past five years given more attention to farming, cleared more land, planted more crops, and received better prices for their products. The higher prices have stimulated them to increase the acreage and reduce their indebtedness and live better, while, perhaps, their cash on hand is but little more. General outlook is good, with prospects for greatly increased agricultural products and industrial output, with a marked tendency toward conservatism in investments. In the lowland districts, where the ditch system is being put in operation, the land has increased 50 per cent in the last twelve months and is being bought up rapidly at the increased price by settlers from the North and East, where land is high. What is known as the 'swamp lands' of southeast Missouri will in a few years be the proverbial 'Garden of Eden.'"

ROCKPORT, ATCHISON COUNTY.

Dean T. Wyatt, cashier of Bank of Atchison County, Rockport, Mo.:

"The financial condition of the farmers in this section is better than ever before. The past five years have been years of good crops and good prices for all farm products; consequently the farmers have made plenty of money. This is strictly a corn and cattle-feeding country. We raise large acreage of corn, with little wheat and oats, and, of course, different hay crops. The corn is nearly all fed here in the county to cattle. We are too far north for any cotton growing. The bank deposits for the past few years have been steadily increasing, and the deposits are practically all farmers' deposits. There have been three new banks organized in the county during five years, and the deposits of the former banks are larger than before their organization.

"Land values have, of course, advanced materially. I would judge there has been an advance of 25 per cent in five years, and when you consider that our lands sell for $100 to $150 per acre, you know that is quite an advance. There is no immigration into this county, on account of the high-priced land, all land sold going to people already residing here.

"Taking it altogether, our people are enjoying much prosperity, paying mortgages, and the financial condition of our farmers is splendid."

ROLLA, PHELPS COUNTY.

J. H. Smith, cashier Merchants and Farmers' Bank, Rolla, Mo.:

"The general business conditions in this section are very good. Farmers are enjoying the highest prices for all products known for years. This, together with fairly good crops, has brought many of them 'out of the woods.' More money is being handled than ever before. Demand for loans is strong, but with supply adequate. This has always been a borrowing community, but many farmers are paying off their loans in full or in part. Land values have been steadily increasing for four or five years, and are yet in good demand. Farmers are putting up better buildings. The log house has become scarce. A better grade of stock is being produced. There is but little speculation except in stock, and that can hardly be called such. Quite a number of people are coming in from the Northern States. Prices on food articles are very high, and in some cases almost prohibitive. Labor is scarce and wages high."

TROY, LINCOLN COUNTY.

Charles Martin, president Farmers and Merchants' Savings Bank, Troy, Mo.:

"The financial condition of the farmers of this vicinity is better than it has ever been. They are carrying larger deposits in the local banks than ever before. The surplus money of the farmers is derived from wheat, corn, and live stock. This surplus will not be invested in wild-cat enterprises. Farm lands have advanced in value 25 per cent in the last two years. Very few investors from other sections."

VALLEY PARK, ST. LOUIS COUNTY.

R. J. Walters, secretary and treasurer Valley Park Trust Company, Valley Park, Mo.:

"There has been a wonderful improvement in every direction in this section in the last five years. Farmers were never in a better financial condition; their deposits with us have quadrupled during the period mentioned, and where we formerly were able to place our funds out on local farm mortgages, that class of loans is now scarcely to be had, the most of the farmers either being out of debt or they loan among one another at a rate that would not be profitable to us. Land values have increased at least 40 per cent, and the farmer is now enjoying some of the luxuries of life. Their houses, as a rule, are new and modern, and they have telephones, and in some cases have automobiles."

APPENDIX B.

[From Dun's Review, November 6, 1909.]

Without exception, the reports of trade, both wholesale and retail, in all parts of the country are more than satisfactory and hold out the promise for 1910 of a year of unequaled business. What this means, expressed in almost inconceivable figures, is that the United States is now increasing its wealth at a rate never before achieved. Neither the high prevailing prices nor the discussion of disputed economic policies seems in any way to shake confidence or check the industrial progress. There has been no further advance in money rates and financial conditions which, three or four weeks ago appeared somewhat threatening, are now undisturbed. The volume of bank clearings, measuring the business transactions of the Nation, are in many cities greater than ever before, and all records in New York for one day were broken during the week.

APPENDIX C.

An inventory of southern progress and prospects.

On the eve of the Thirteenth Decennial Census the Manufacturers' Record ventures upon a forecast of the showing that the South will make in 1910 in comparison with 1900 in the following table:

	1900.	1910.
Population	23,548,401	28,685,000

[a] The figures are for the year preceding the census year.

CONDENSED FACTS ABOUT THE SOUTH.

It is a fact that this year the South's cotton crop will be worth not far from $1,000,000,000, or twice as much as the output of all the gold mines of the world for the same year.

It is a fact that the South is producing 800,000,000 bushels of grain a year.

It is a fact that the total value of the agricultural products of the South this year will be $2,550,000,000, which is more than the total, excluding slaughtered animals, of the United States in 1890, when the population of the country was 63,000,000, while the population of the South at present is 27,500,000.

It is a fact that such remarkable agricultural advance proves the agricultural capabilities of the South and the activity and energy of the farmers of the South.

It is a fact that the Rothschilds and other English financiers, in connection with leading New York financial people, are building at a cost of several million dollars a great steel plant in Alabama which will employ about 3,500 people, and that one of the associates of the Rothschilds who recently visited the South, in referring to the resources and progress of this section, said to the Manufacturers' Record:

"I am astonished beyond words to express. I have visited California and Canada, but have never seen anything to equal the great development that is going on in the South."

It is a fact that the South has 62,000 square miles of bituminous coal lands, as against 17,000 in Great Britain, Germany, France, and Austria combined.

It is a fact that the South is now mining over 90,000,000 tons of bituminous coal a year, as compared with 42,000,000 tons, the entire bituminous coal output of the United States in 1880.

It is a fact that according to official records the South has more iron ore than foreign experts claim for all of Europe.

It is a fact that the United States Steel Corporation, having already invested about $50,000,000 in Alabama, is carrying out vast improvements, including the building of a $3,000,000 steel and wire plant, a storage reservoir lake for the use of its own works, to hold 2,500,000,000 gallons of water, a coke-oven plant to produce 3,000 tons of coke per day, and other undertakings which will add immensely to the prosperity of the whole South.

It is a fact that the United States Steel Corporation is handling a large part of its export trade in steel rails through its Alabama plant, and that it is now filling an order for 110,000 tons of Birmingham-made rails for shipment via southern ports to the Argentine and Brazil.

It is a fact that the Birmingham-made steel rail has no superior in the United States.

It is a fact that southern cotton mills are now consuming 2,500,000 bales of cotton a year, or as much as all other mills in the United States are consuming of southern-grown cotton.

It is a fact that the South is producing nearly one-half the sulphur of the world, and is absolutely dominating the world's sulphur trade.

It is a fact that phosphate rock, the foundation of the great fertilizer industry, is found in larger quantity and under more advantageous conditions of mining than elsewhere in the world, and that the rest of the world must largely depend upon the South for its supply of phosphate rock.

It is a fact that over 40 per cent of all the standing timber in the United States is in the South.

It is a fact that a southern port outranks all other ports in the United Staets in export trade except New York, and that the trend of foreign commerce through southern ports is increasing more rapidly than elsewhere in the country.

It is a fact that the greatest railroad builders of America are straining every nerve to extend their lines to the centers of southern activity and to reach southern ports in order to win strategic positions in this section, which they recognize is to be the center of the world's greatest industrial interests.

It is a fact that nowhere else on earth are found in the same country the foundations of all great manufacturing interests—cotton, coal, iron, lumber, phosphate rock, oil, sulphur, gas, water powers, and many other things.

It is a fact that the marbles, granites, building stones, and clays of the South are unsurpassed in quality and scarcely equaled in quantity elsewhere in America, furnishing a limitless field for development work.

It is a fact that the South offers greater advantages than any other region in America; that apple growing in the South is as profitable as apple growing on the Pacific coast; that the production of oranges, grape fruit, and early vegetables in this section offers better opportunities for money-making than similar industries anywhere else in the United States.

It is a fact that these facts are at last beginning to make their impression upon the people of the whole country, and that over 200,000 northern and western people are annually pouring into this section, at present mainly into Texas and Florida, but with an increasing movement into every other Southern State.

It is a fact that this vast host is only the advance guard of a mighty army of people who, realizing southern opportunities more than the people of the South themselves, are coming into this section because they find it more inviting for home making, for agricultural operations, for industrial pursuits, for health and climatic advantages than any other region of America.

It is a fact that southern railroads must spend $2,000,000,000 in ten years to provide facilities needed in southern growth.

It is a fact that what is probably the most comprehensive and remarkable warehousing system in America is being developed in a southern town, and is, in part, already in operation.

It is a fact that the South is building two of the most remarkable railroads ever constructed in America, and that one of them is the most unique ever built in the world.

It is a fact that the South is now spending $20,000,000 in building cotton mills.

It is a fact that good roads, which mean more for agricultural prosperity than anything else before the public, are being built all over the South as never before, at a cost of many millions of dollars.

It is a fact that all of the present development of the railroad and industrial work in the South is only the revival of what was being done prior to 1860 on a relatively still larger scale, which shows the inborn trait of southern people to turn to industrial interests.

It is a fact that the South lost by emigration between 1865 and 1900 about 2,500,000 of its own white people, and this was a far greater loss than the ruin and destruction by war.

It is a fact that this drain has largely stopped, and that southern men and boys are now finding more avenues of employment at home than elsewhere.

It is a fact that the tide of investment of American and foreign capital and the movement of population is turning southward as never before, and that wonderful things are in store for this section.

It is a fact that with a population less by 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 than what the total population of the United States was in 1860 the wealth of the South is $6,000,000,000 greater than the total wealth of the whole country in 1860.

It is a fact that great drainage undertakings are now being carried out in the South, reclaiming wet or overflowed lands and making susceptible to cultivation some of the richest lands in the world. Much of this easily reclaimed land has a soil not surpassed, if equaled, in the world for fertility and depth. Through the utilization of such land the wonderful development of rice growing in Louisiana and Texas was made possible, and the hundreds of millions of values thus created will be more than duplicated by further drainage operations.

It is a fact that these things should be known to every man and woman, every boy and girl in the South, that they may have a better appreciation of the possibilities of their own country and be inspired to do their full part in the utilization of its resources.

APPENDIX D.

[Annual message of T. M. Campbell, governor of Texas, January 14, 1909.]

TEXAS PROSPERITY.

You have assembled under favorable conditions. The state treasury is on a cash basis. The State is generally prosperous, and the people are contented and happy.

OIL AND RICE.

With respect to the oil and rice industry, the platform of the Democratic party reads as follows:

"Recognizing that the oil and rice industries are of great importance to the growth of the State, we recommend legislation that will protect them."

APPENDIX F.

INDUSTRIAL HOUSTON—ITS ADVANTAGEOUS POSITION FOR MANUFACTURING ENTERPRISES.

[Special correspondence Manufacturers' Record.]

HOUSTON, TEX., January 4.

While Houston has for the past twenty years occupied a prominent position on the map of Texas, its growth within recent years has been so phenomenal as to have attracted universal attention. The result has been that its possibilities and inherent advantages are being investigated by capitalists who are seeking investments which promise flattering returns and a steady advancement in values.

With a population of 105,000 robust and enterprising citizens who have absolute faith in the future of this city, the scheme of development has become so varied as to include many lines of human endeavor, and the fact that all of their industrial enterprises are in a flourishing condition emphasizes the fact that Houston has become a recognized manufacturing center, its factories, of diversified character, all running to their fullest capacity, and many enlarging their plants.

Manufacturing industries do not continue to flourish and expand where conditions are not favorable. The peculiar location of Houston, with its 17 distinct lines of rail transportation and its ship channel giving access to the Gulf of Mexico, affords facilities for the distribution of her manufactured products such as are enjoyed by no other city of the Southwest. Proximity to raw material is an economic proposition of the greatest consideration, and with a wealth of iron ore, valuable forests of hardwoods and pine, and with the oil and coal fields of eastern Texas within easy access, many new industries have been established within the past few years. The character of labor available and the wages paid are essential items which the manufacturer must consider in seeking a location, and while the prevailing wages are about the same as are paid in other cities, it is a fact that the character of the labor to be secured here as regards intelligence, skill, sobriety, and good order, is above the average, and is composed only of representatives of the most desirable nationalities, the kinds that make good citizens, a majority of whom own their own homes. Houston is a stranger to strikes and riots, and upon the same wages the workingman lives better and enjoys more than in any other city of equal size.

Its 173 industries, representing an investment of $11,061,216, turning out products valued at $50,000,000, and with a wage expenditure of $5,313,208 to 9,016 employees, embrace a variety of articles ranging from the giant freight locomotive to the minutest articles of household economy, and their qualities are of such a high order as to almost eliminate the problem of competition. The latter condition is largely made possible by reason of the material reduction in freight transportation rates because of the utilization of the great Houston ship channel, for the completion of which the Federal Government has made an appropriation of $4,500,000, a portion of which has already been applied to this project, with the result that at present there is a continuous depth of 19 feet between the turning basin and the outlet to the Gulf of Mexico. The further dredging of the ship channel to a depth of 25 feet, which has been recommended by the United States engineers, has been vigorously agitated at the recent convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, the city of Houston obligating itself to issue bonds in the sum of $1,250,000 upon the Rivers and Harbors Committee recommending a like appropriation by the present Congress, it being estimated that its completion would necessitate an expenditure of $2,500,000. A tract of land at the turning basin, consisting of 137 acres, belonging to the city of Houston, is being made available for shipping facilities, such as slips, wharves, warehouses, etc., the use of which shall be absolutely free to shipowners. No monopoly of terminal facilities by transportation lines, such as exists at freight concentrating points on other navigable streams, will be possible on the Houston ship channel. Several of the rail lines entering Houston, realizing the volume of business which will eventually develop, have already begun extensive improvements, which will soon be utilized. The completion of the ship channel will make this city the distributing point for the entire Southwest and a port of magnitude second to none. The import trade with Mexico, the South American Republics, and Panama will be stimulated, and the fact that the port of Houston is 500 miles nearer to the granaries of the West than are the eastern ports and 300 miles nearer than New Orleans, with a grade offering the least traction resistance, how logical it is for this city to become the concentrating point for our vast foreign shipments.

Essential to every manufacturing enterprise are the banking facilities of a community. In this respect Houston is particularly well represented by 10 national and state banks and 4 trust companies, with an aggregate capital of over $6,000,000, desposits subject to withdrawal amounting to $27,000,000, and cash amounting to more than $13,000,000. The gross bank clearings for the past fiscal year aggregated $1,250,000,000. The condition of its banks is the surest barometer of the city's commercial and industrial greatness. The fact that loans and discounts have increased, the fact that every item indicative of increased business shows an increase over conditions of the previous year, is absolute proof of an enormous increase in every line of trade and industry.

The 17 rail lines entering Houston, several maintaining the most extensive shops in the South, employ a total of 6,198 men, with a pay roll aggregating $4,866,221 annually. The Houston Belt and Terminal Company will, when its improvements now under construction have been completed, have expended over $4,000,000 for terminal facilities. Railroads do not incur such vast expenditures where conditions do not warrant. The rail lines maintain in Harris County 516 miles of trackage, valued at $9,485,364. For the fiscal year ending June 30 there was received at this city a total of 2,604,034 bales of cotton, that portion of the staple moving over the ship channel approximating in value the sum of $26,000,000. The six Houston cotton-oil mills, representing an investment of $2,250,000, turn out products valued at more than $4,000,000 annually. Houston is the lumber center of Texas, with an annual business aggregating $30,000,000, representing a total of 46 corporations and a capitalization of over $30,000,000. This city is the oil center for Texas and Oklahoma, there being a pipe-line connection with all the Gulf coast field, as well as with the Oklahoma field. The production of the Gulf coast fields for the twelve months ended July 31 was 13,746,037 barrels. Houston is also the center of the rice industry, its 6 mills handling a large proportion of the production of the coastal belt.

The wholesale trade aggregates $125,000,000 annually, and the retail trade $51,000,000. Its free public schools represent a valuation of $965,100, and its churches, several among the handsomest houses of worship in the South, are valued at more than $2,250,000. The Rice Institute, with an endowment of $7,000,000, will be the most approved institution of learning of its kind in the South, and construction will begin with the new year.

The city has 80 miles of paved streets and 200 linear miles of paved sidewalks. The commission form of government prevails, and all general expenditures for the upkeep and improvement of the municipality are met with current funds. The death rate is only 10.4, and the thrift, enterprise, and development of Houston forms a conspicuous page in the history of human achievements in the Lone Star State, and Houston to-day, with its broad streets, attractive business houses, and comfortable homes, impresses the visitor with the fact that her citizens are among the most wide-awake in the entire South.

Brains and grit, pure Gulf breezes, and the finest of artesian water, together with enlarged opportunities for profitable business operations, tell the story of the growth of a city that is not wanting in a single element of the highest modern civilization. Generalities have been omitted, for the reason that this is an era of commercialism, when capital is not influenced by abstract propositions. The endeavor has been made to place the city of Houston before the reader in a concrete form, with a cordial invitation to come and abide.

APPENDIX G.

AUTOMOBILES AT DALLAS.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Dallas, Tex., January 7.

Editor Manufacturers' Record:

The preeminent advantage of the city of Dallas as a distributing point is especially demonstrated in the wonderful development which has taken place during the year 1909 in the automobile industry.

One year ago there were 268 automobiles in the city of Dallas, these having been purchased for the most part in the larger cities of the North and East where the Dallas automobile enthusiasts have gone to market. A year ago there was but one dealer in Dallas. Now the market has come to Dallas to a most remarkable extent, and a careful compilation of the conditions in Dallas at present develops the following facts: That there are 911 automobiles in operation in the city; that during the year there have been established 21 jobbing houses, aside from 9 dealers in supplies, accessories, and motor cycles, making a total of 30 wholesale concerns in the city of Dallas established here during the year 1909, handling nothing but automobiles and supplies.

Four of the concerns have built magnificent salesrooms and warehouses, with a total investment of $164,000. The total number of cars actually sold and delivered this past year for Dallas is 3,544, amounting in wholesale sales to $4,206,380.59.

These concerns have branch agencies all over the Southwest, and their cars have been distributed in Texas, showing conclusively that Texas has acquired the automobile idea very rapidly, and this is attested from the fact that there is one county in Texas in which there are only 56 families; 42 of these families own automobiles.

The cow pony has given way to the automobile, and some of the ranchmen of Texas are now "riding fences" in automobiles rather than on horseback, but, above all things, it demonstrates the fact that there is a remarkable development of the cities and towns in Texas; that the people are most progressive; that we have good roads; that we have a climate where an automobile can be used twelve months in the year.

The taxicab business of the city shows that Dallas people get there, and "get there in a hurry." There are three taxicab companies in Dallas, operating 17 taxicabs and 5 touring cars, and they are all doing a good business. This in a city of 100,000 people means more than the number of vehicles that there are for hire in New York City.

One company has just scored a wonderful triumph in the line of advertising for Texas in demonstrating the possibilities of this field in the automobile line. On December 21 a trainload of its automobiles left the factory at Flint, Mich., reaching Dallas December 30, making a daylight trip all the way, advertising to the world by means of monster banners on each side of every car proclaiming the fact that it contained automobiles for Texas.

The total value of the automobiles in this shipment amounted to $163,970. The total tonnage of freight in the train was 459,200. It was a solid train of 40 carloads, containing 127 machines.

In examination of the facts and figures compiled along the line of the automobile industry it is sometimes regarded that the automobile investment on behalf of the public is a withdrawal from circulation of an immense amount of money which should be used in the commercial and industrial development of that town.

While this is true in a sense of Dallas, we have to stop and consider that this industry employs 105 mechanics in this city; that there are 380 chauffeurs and employees, making, together with the salesmen, over 500 men who for the most part have come to Dallas, bringing with them money, energy, and brains, and developed for us a new industry, and while there has been withdrawn from circulation for the purchase of automobiles by the citizens of Dallas perhaps $1,250,000 during the past year, the loosing of money in the channels of trade by those who can best afford to spend it has brought prosperity in many lines, and this is only one phase of the economic question which is involved as to the advantage which is gained from an industry of this character.

The automobile business is but one of the many wholesale lines which are a great factor in the upbuilding of Dallas. As a jobbing center the figures this year show that Dallas has done $128,856,380 in a wholesale jobbing and manufacturing way, and has demonstrated the preeminent advantage which Dallas has as a distributing point to the most fertile territory in the United States.

APPENDIX H.

[From the Manufacturers' Record, January, 1910.]

THE SONG OF PROSPERITY.

The Baldwin (Ala.) Times has a new editor—new to the Times—though long a factor in the newspaper work of that State. In his initial editorial in the Times, he says:

"The present management of the Baldwin Times takes hold of the helm to guide the future destinies of this paper at a most opportune and propitious season, with a clear sheet and a fair wind. The tide of immigration has set strongly to the southward, and Baldwin County is in the direct path of the movement. It has been said with apparent truth that this is the best advertised county in the Southern States. Still the half of the possibilities and potentialities of this favored section have not been told to the world. The song of the builder's saw, the creaking of the stump puller of the clearer of land, and the 'Whoa, mule!' of the plowman combine in a daylight chorus from one end of the county to the other, and the beacon fires at night, made by those who are clearing up for tilling what was but recently barren, cut-over land, are so numerous on the hills and in the valleys of Baldwin as to remind one of an army encamped. All this means prosperity. It means more homes, more products for the market, more business for the merchant, and, incidentally, more subscriptions and advertising patronage, more readers, and more friends for the Baldwin Times. It means more churches, more fraternal lodges, more and better schools, and more children loving life, laughing and living in the sunshine."

The story as thus presented is a thousand times more interesting to the people of Baldwin County than would be reports of murders and suicides and scandals. The story of material development when rightly told can be made interesting to every reader of every country paper in the South, for this material development, as the Times says, "means more churches, more fraternal lodges, more and better schools, and more children loving life, laughing and living in the sunshine."

That is the meaning of material progress. That is why the people in the South who are working for its material upbuilding are bending their energies to this work. They have a broader vision than simply the material side, for the people of the South are catching a glimpse of the possibilities of the good that may come out of material development. We take it that the Baldwin Times will devote its energies largely to telling from week to week the story of the successful farm, the well-contented settler from elsewhere, the new church and the new school, and the new and better roads that are built, and in publishing such news as this it will create friendly rivalry to make other farms successful, to build other churches and other schools and other good roads, all for the betterment of the whole community. And what the Times ought to do, and we presume will do, may be followed to good advantage by all the papers, large and small, throughout the South.

What a splendid hit could be made by some leading daily in every State if it had on the editorial page of every issue a column headed "A song of prosperity," and in that column had from every part of its State brief items of news telling about the betterment of farms, the building of better roads, of new schools and new churches, the advance in the value of agricultural lands, the incoming of settlers from elsewhere, the rise in the value of local securities, and other things that tell of progress and prosperity. It would be the best column to be found in any daily paper in the South. It would take a Frank Stanton to do justice in this "song of prosperity." In other words, it should be the product of one of the ablest, sunniest men on the staff, a man who knows such news and knows how to present it.

Mr. LAMB. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, on the first day of the Sixtieth Congress and the first day I ever occupied a seat on the floor of the House as a Member, I introduced a bill to increase the pensions of civil war soldiers, and since that time have made the best effort within my power to secure the passage of such legislation.

I regret to say, Mr. Chairman, my efforts have not resulted in all I hoped to accomplish, but I have the satisfaction of knowing I have been true to my soldier constituency, that I have made the best effort I could to reward them for the patriotic service they rendered in behalf of their country, and that if Members of Congress had believed as I did every soldier who carried a gun in defense of the Union would now be drawing a pension of $1 per day. One of the first bills I introduced two years ago was a bill to equalize the pensions of widows. Under the old law a widow whose soldier husband died with a disease contracted in the service received $12 per month, while the widow whose husband died with a disease not contracted in the service received but $8 per month. There never was any justice in that law, and I am truly glad we succeeded in passing the act of April 19, 1908, which equalizes the pensions of all widows by placing them on the rolls at $12 per month.

I regret, however, that the act of April 19, 1908, applies only to widows who were married prior to June 27, 1890. When the bill passed the House I protested against this provision and insisted that it apply to all widows married up to that time, but on that proposition I was voted down.

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill (H. R. 13409), now pending before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, striking out that arbitrary date of June 27, 1890, and making the law apply to all widows married prior to April 19, 1908, at which time the bill was passed. I sincerely hope this bill will be reported out of the committee and passed at an early date. While I am anxious for the passage of the bill mentioned, I think it even more important, Mr. Chairman, that we proceed without delay to enact into law another bill I have introduced, now in the hands of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, known as House bill 12390, which bill provides that all soldiers who rendered military or naval service in the war with Mexico or in the late civil war, and have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be placed on the rolls and receive a pension of $30 per month.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a copy of the bill referred to, which I will insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks upon this subject:

A bill (H. R. 12390) granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the civil war and the war with Mexico.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late civil war, or sixty days in the war with Mexico, and who shall have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall, upon making proof of such facts according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the pension roll, and be entitled to receive a pension of $30 per month; and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Bureau of Pensions after the passage and approval of this act: Provided, That pensioners who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Bureau of Pensions, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions in such form as he may prescribe, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall prevent any pensioner or person entitled to a pension from prosecuting his claim and receiving a pension under any other general or special act: Provided further, That no person shall receive a pension under any other law at the same time or for the same period that he is now receiving a pension under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a greater pension under any other general or special law than he would be entitled to receive under the provisions herein shall be pensionable under this act.

SEC. 2. That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed hereunder.

SEC. 3. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for service rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions or securing any pension under this act.

This bill, if enacted into law, will give every soldier who served ninety days and was honorably discharged a pension of $1 per day. Now, Mr. Chairman, there should be no time lost in passing this bill. It will be an act of tardy justice. The old soldiers are now dying at the rate of one every thirteen minutes; over 115 each day; 42,000 I am informed died last year, and still you say, "Wait, wait, wait." Once a year you tenderly scatter a few flowers on the graves of those who have answered the call; now let us scatter a few flowers in the pathway of those who yet live.

Those of us who were not old enough to participate in that memorable struggle should remember that the many blessings we now enjoy and which came to us by reason of their patriotism and devotion to the country, their fidelity and bravery, should prompt us to give them in their old age a pension adequate to provide for them in such a way that their last years may be filled with the pleasures and comforts of life. To do this will not be an act of charity, but an act of justice.

We owe it to them for the gallant service they rendered and as an evidence of our thankfulness and gratitude and our grateful appreciation, and in remembrance of the sacrifices they have made in behalf of liberty and justice, and for the perpetuity of our institutions and in the establishment of true freedom and genuine liberty in the greatest Republic the sun ever shone upon.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, we will never be able to pay in full the debt we owe the men who endured hardships and privations, who offered their lives on the altar of their country that the Union might be preserved. I do not plead for the passage of my bill on the ground of charity; but I contend, sir, that the soldiers of the civil war were never paid in full for the service they rendered. As you all know, they were paid in depreciated currency, the same currency the Government received from the Wall street money loaners who bought the bonds issued and sold by the Government to pay the cost of the war.

The old soldier was never paid with money worth a hundred cents on the dollar, but the bondholders have been paid in gold. By an act in 1869, known as "An act to strengthen the public credit," Congress made these same bonds payable in gold, and millions of dollars of the people's money went into the pockets of men who loved their money more than they loved their country, while the men who loved their country better than their lives and who were willing to give up all God had given them for the preservation of the States are still unpaid.

By national legislation we have declared that money is more sacred than manhood; that lucre is more valuable than patriotism; that greed shall be recognized in national legislation above and beyond the blood of martyrs shed in a sacred cause.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of the bill I now propose, by reason of its merit, will not only strengthen the public credit, but will also strengthen the public conscience. If the soldiers of the civil war had been paid in money worth a hundred cents on the dollar, they would have received in excess of what was paid them the sum of $51,061,222. In other words, this was the amount of depreciation on their monthly pay and has been withheld from them for a period of forty-six years. The interest on this sum of money for forty-six years, not compounded, but simple interest, at 6 per cent, would be $140,929,072. Add to this the principal and you have the sum of $191,990,294 honestly due and as a matter of justice, leaving out any patriotic consideration, should be paid.

Mr. Chairman, we are unnecessarily expending a vast sum of money each year that should go to the soldiers in the way of increased pensions. It costs us annually $400,000 to maintain the 17 pension agencies, and the Government has no more use for them than a dog has with 17 tails. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions have time and time again recommended their discontinuance and assured us that pensions can be paid just as quickly, and even quicker, from Washington than by the present methods. Then we are spending $380,000 every year for pension detectives, and, in addition, a vast sum of money for special examiners, boards, and so forth. How much better it would be to cut out all this useless expense and place all soldiers on the rolls at $1 per day.

Two years ago, when I pressed a bill I then had before the committee for the relief of soldiers, I was met with the argument that Congress had not long before passed the McCumber Act, and that no pension legislation would be considered at that time. Then again, one year ago, when I made a plea for the old soldier, I was met with the argument that there was a deficit in the Government Treasury of nearly $100,000,000, and that we had no money to pay increased pensions. Mr. Chairman, during the two sessions mentioned Congress appropriated over $2,000,000,000, a vast amount of which was unnecessary and absolutely thrown away. Over 14,000 new offices were created, and the raise of salaries, together with the salaries of the new officers, amounted to the enormous sum of $28,990,289.

Plenty of money, Mr. Chairman, to increase the President's salary from $50,000 to $75,000 per year, but no money to increase the pensions of the old soldiers. Plenty of money to provide every convenience and comfort for yourselves, but no money with which to pay the honest debt we owe the men who saved the Union. Plenty of money to appropriate $136,000,000 for the use of the navy, a large amount of which was positively wasted, but no money to appropriate for the men who offered their lives for the preservation of the States. Plenty of money to appropriate $101,000,000 for the use of the army, a considerable amount of which was dissipated in the payment of high salaries and for useless experiments, but no money to pay the boys in blue whose service made it possible for you and me to enjoy a united country. Plenty of money to appropriate millions for rivers and harbors, but not a dollar for the men who gave the best years of their lives in defending the flag. Plenty of money to appropriate that special committees may travel all over the country, making expensive investigations of various subjects, but no money to pay an honest debt we owe the men whose heroic efforts and patriotic service made possible the greatest and grandest Nation the world has ever known.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, I have no patience with the plea that the old soldier has been properly cared for. You have provided soldiers' homes, and the records show that it costs from $400 to $700 a year to care for each and every soldier provided for in this manner. Pass this bill of mine, giving them a dollar a day, and they will go back to their old homes and live among their relatives and friends, and the tremendous expense of maintaining soldiers' homes will be reduced to a minimum.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this bill will have an early consideration, and I ask Members of the House to join me in bringing it to a vote. I want to know who in the House are the true friends of the soldier. Many of you when the campaign is on tell the soldiers in your districts how you love them and how anxious you are to see their pensions increased, and then, after the election is over, you come to Congress and never raise your voice in their behalf. I am glad, however, to know the old soldier does have many friends on the floor of the House, and I appeal to each one of you to aid me in bringing about the passage of this bill.

I serve notice on you now that if my bill or a similar bill is not passed during this session I will be back again next winter and continue the fight for more liberal pensions, to the end that full justice may yet be done the few who remain as representatives of the bravest, the noblest, the most patriotic and self-sacrificing soldiery ever seen on the field of battle.

Mr. LAMB. I now yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been expecting to hear some speeches on that side of the House in line with the one just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

I knew that the Republican side of this House had realized that it was absolutely necessary to come to the defense of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, for that law is indeed in bad repute throughout the country. The high price of foodstuff, doubled and trebled under your tariff after it leaves the producer, is pinching with hunger millions of our people and driving them to vow they will eat no more meat forever. When your party looks upon the distress and suffering that it has wrought in its efforts to serve its tariff masters, it tries to lead the people away from the truth, and in the hope of hiding the hand that smites us it declares that the farmers are responsible for the high prices of foodstuff. The meat trust and high tariff, twin monsters of distress and misery, the offspring of the Republican party, are responsible for the terrible conditions that confront the masses of the people to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The farmer, who sells his beef on foot for 6 cents per pound, is far removed from the unreasonable profits that the beef trust receives when it sells that same beef for 30 and 40 cents per pound to the consumer, and the man who gets a dollar per bushel for his wheat is far removed from the $12 and $14 that the beaten biscuits and the short-loaf bread brings in the market. Before I close I shall refer to some other things mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while we are considering the agricultural bill, I want to discuss some matters regarding agriculture especially appropriate at this time. When I came here I found that the agricultural interests of the South were not being treated right by Congress. I saw that these interests could be helped by legislative action, and I set myself to the task of bringing certain matters to the attention of this body and to show how we could be materially benefited by the enactment of certain fair and just laws; and while I have not by any means been able to do all the things that needed to be done, I feel that I have accomplished some things of real value to our people.

The gentleman from Illinois has said something about the high price of cotton, and I wish to say in the outset that no people on this earth have ever produced any crop under such difficulties as the people of the South produced the last cotton crop. We have never produced a cotton crop that cost as much as the crop that has been marketed and the remnant of which is now being marketed. The high cost of living and the high price of agricultural implements, and so forth, have contributed to the great cost of producing that cotton crop, and the high cost of these things that the farmer used in making this crop is the fruit of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in passing about cotton. Cotton has not brought any more than it ought to have brought, when you consider the cost of production and the short crop made, in the light of the world's demand for cotton. Fifteen cents per pound, or $75 per bale, is not too much when we consider the price that the consumer has to pay for the finished product—cotton in cloth. We are told, Mr. Chairman, that a bale of cotton weighing 500 pounds, when manufactured into socks at 10 cents per pair, brings $350; and at 20 cents per pair, brings $700; and handkerchiefs at three for a quarter, brings $500.

I wish to say to my New England friends that, if they had the natural monopoly that we have in the South, if they owned the cotton belt as we do, they would make us pay 20 cents per pound for cotton every year, and fill their newspapers and magazines full of arguments until they convinced us that we were getting it cheap and that we ought to be thankful to them and to Providence that we did not have to pay more than 20 cents per pound. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Cotton is being put to more uses now than ever. Mercerized cotton so resembles silk and is so much cheaper that it is being substituted for silk. It is used in the manufacture of woolen goods, and the demand for it as a substitute for wool is on the increase. Cotton is the master production, and enters into nearly every phase of American life. It was behind cotton bales at New Orleans that Jackson won the victory over the British. Wherever the American soldier goes the white fiber of the cotton field goes with him, and wherever he strikes camp the field is dotted with white tents made of cotton.

The flying sails of the ships at sea come from the snowy cotton fields of the South. The cord that rings the bell on the train and puts on the emergency brake in time of danger is made of cotton. In the springtime, when the agricultural army is in motion, cotton enters into the paraphernalia of the mule; a cotton backband gauges the depth that the plow shall go, whether shallow or deep; and cotton plow lines constitute the strong cords that guide and control the stubborn mule.

In traveling through the cotton belt on a warm day there is nothing more refreshing than a deep draught of water from "The old oaken bucket that hangs in the well," and here the cotton rope is the kindly agent that brings it from the cool, dark depths below.

If, while strolling through the cotton belt, you should find a swarm of mosquitoes, conspiring to disturb your rest at night, there is the mosquito bar made of cotton, spreading its white wings above your head, hovering about you while you sleep. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, dressmakers and tailors have at last learned how to "make up" cotton goods in the most fascinating and attractive way. The cotton suit that I wore here last summer, and those worn by other Members, looked better than the flannel suits worn by other gentlemen here, and they did not cost one-third as much. They were cooler and more comfortable every way. I have advocated it, and I believe the day will come when the southern people will wear cotton almost exclusively from April to September. By this means the South will consume nearly 4,000,000 bales more than is now consumed. For spring and summer cotton is the coolest and cheapest wearing apparel in the world, and our people are at last beginning to realize the value of patronizing this home industry. Civilized men the world over are coming to know that cotton is the healthiest and most comfortable fabric that can be worn next to the skin. The man who suffers from colds and grip in the winter by reason of wearing woolens next the skin can obtain health and happiness by putting on the South's sensible garment made of cotton.

Cotton is used in making wheels for automobiles, and nearly 500,000 bales a year are being used for this purpose. When we go to using cotton as bagging for wrapping our cotton bales we will consume a great deal for this purpose. We will make a rough bagging and soak it in a composition of cotton-seed oil and coal tar, which will give it sufficient weight and make it waterproof, and this will become the greatest cotton bagging in the world.

There are more people who wear cotton goods, who use cotton in various ways, than ever before in the history of cotton production. There are more cotton factories in the world and more men weaving cotton into cloth than ever before in our history.

So, Mr. Chairman, the fairly good price that we have received for cotton this season is accounted for, as I will show you later, by natural conditions—short crop and increased demand for cotton and cotton goods—together with the work of the farmer and merchant in intelligently handling the crop in the selling season.

You may make up your minds to one thing, and that is, the intelligence and courage of the cotton producers of the South have been aroused, and our people are at last beginning to figure on the cost of production, and they are beginning to estimate what the crop yield in money will be when a reasonable profit is added to the cost of production. And, I may add, they are actually beginning to demand the cost of production, with a reasonable profit added. It is high time that the farmer had something to say about the price that he should receive for his cotton, since he is about the only fellow who has not asserted his God-given right to demand a fair return for his efforts and his labor. He has been badly imposed upon, but he is at last beginning to assert himself intelligently. His representatives in Congress have exposed the illegitimate speculation done in the exchange, condemned its rules, and had investigations made by the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, when we commenced to inquire into the conduct of the New York exchange, we found it handling fictitious products instead of cotton; bogus sales were made and no cotton ever required to fill a contract. Differences were settled with money, and it was never intended that cotton should play any part in the transaction. The practice that obtained, under the rules of the exchange, did not contemplate a delivery of cotton, and this irresponsible concern, self-constituted judge of cotton prices, had permission to sell, in unlimited quantities, margins, without actually demanding the delivery of cotton or being required to deliver it. Prior to the agitation of this question by myself and other southern Representatives and intelligent action on the part of the growers, the exchange, controlled by the "bears" in the interest of the spinners of New England and the United Kingdom, had its way.

The New York Exchange sold in a season a hundred million bales of fictitious stuff called cotton. They did not have any cotton, they did not want any cotton, they had no use for cotton. Not a pound of cotton figured in their transaction; no demand was made upon the producer for a single bale, and yet this aggregation of men composing the exchange assumed the right to fix the price of the real cotton. The producer was not considered in the matter of determining the price of cotton. The law had permitted the exchange to fix the price so long that the producer accepted what they did and said nothing, and the spinners of the world had come to look to the exchange to fix the price upon the raw cotton. Desiring to buy the raw material as cheaply as possible, their sympathies were, of course, on the "bear" side, and in times past they have assisted the "bears" in creating the impression throughout the cotton belt that a large crop was being made and that they had plenty of cotton on hand at the mills to run them for a long time, and that the price would not be very good. For a long time the cotton producer did not know what the trouble was. He knew that something was at work depriving him of a fair price for his cotton. The evil has been pointed out. If we could have a real cotton exchange, spot cotton would be in demand and the producer would be consulted, as he should be, about the price of cotton. The cotton grower has been enabled to see just how he has been imposed upon by the exchange that claimed to reflect the operation of the law of supply and demand, and that it misrepresented the facts regarding the supply of cotton always on the side of a large crop and low prices. Very often it covered the country with circular letters claiming that there would be an overproduction—more cotton than the world could use. Out of all this agitation has come great good to the Southland. The people of the cotton belt have at last realized that much depends upon the handling of the cotton crop intelligently.

Time was when the whole South sold cotton on a declining market. In fact, the bulk of the cotton crop was sold on a declining market. Just let the market break and all was bustle and stir in the cotton belt. The people with cotton to sell rushed to the market place. They did not realize that they were the masters of the situation; that if they would quit selling at destructive prices, the law of supply and demand would control in the interest of reasonable prices. They felt that they were in the grasp of some mysterious power, and that they would have to hurry and get rid of their cotton before it became a drug on the market. But, Mr. Chairman, times have changed. Farmers and merchants in the South now look in amazement on the time when they obeyed the New England and foreign spinners' "bear" agents in the exchange. They know more about cotton, its uses and abuses, now than they have ever known. When the exchange in control of the forces that make low prices undertakes to fix a price low and unprofitable to the cotton producer, cotton goes to the market very slowly and very little is sold. When there is a sharp break in the price, such as once caused a rush to the market, our people quit selling and wait for the return of a reasonable price. They are forced to do this or be robbed. One thing is certain, since our people have become aroused and are becoming acquainted with the forces that have been at work robbing and plundering the cotton growers of the South, since the regulation of the cotton exchanges have been receiving the attention of southern Members in Congress, the evil features of the exchanges pointed out and condemned, cotton has fared better and the average price during these years has been higher than for any like period when the exchange, undisturbed, executed its own sweet will. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The theory of a spot-cotton exchange has been put into practice this season. Haynes, Scales, Brown, and Patten bought cotton—real cotton—and held it for a profit, and therein lay their power as factors in helping to fix the price of cotton. When the foreign spinner and the New England spinner went into an agreement in October to quit buying cotton, to withdraw from the market and put it back to 10 cents, these men that I have named bought actual cotton, and what happened, Mr. Chairman? What effect did it have on the spinners? It made them sit up and take notice that when the farmer and the merchant of the South were inclined to demand and help secure a fair price for cotton that men with money saw their opportunity to make more money by dealing in cotton. Men who could command large sums of money knew that the crop was short, and that the people of the South had the courage and the intelligence to refuse to accept a low and unreasonable price; so they bought what cotton they could and held it. Where was the spinner then, with his secret agreement to injure the cotton farmer by depriving him of fair prices and living profits? He was up in the air. With the producer handling his cotton intelligently and selling it sparingly, and men of means buying what cotton they could get and holding it, actual cotton became the controlling power; then what happened? The foreign spinner broke his agreement without a word of warning and hurried back to the market place bidding for cotton, real cotton. Next came the New England spinner, and competitive buying under the law of supply and demand of real cotton fixed the price. The principle of the spot-cotton exchange was at work and real cotton was in demand, for the spinners of the world had to have it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was instrumental in passing the law requiring statistics to be gathered from the manufacturers of cotton in the United States. As the printed hearings in the Agricultural Committee will show, I brought this matter to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture and proved by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics that if it were just and fair to make reports on crop conditions and have gin reports as to the number of bales of cotton ginned, for the benefit of the manufacturer, it was fair to the cotton producer to have the Government report the number of bales of cotton on hand at the various factories in the United States. I introduced a bill for this purpose, and made a speech on it in the House. It was so plain that my cause was just that Members on both sides of the House told me that I was right and that they would vote for my bill. Mr. LEVER, of South Carolina, introduced a joint resolution on the same subject. He was a faithful member of the Committee on Agriculture, and was present when I first brought the matter to the attention of the committee. In order that we should not fail to have action taken on the matter at that session of Congress, I had my bill referred to the Committee on Agriculture, of which I was a member. Then I introduced a joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Census, the same committee to which Mr. LEVER's resolution had been referred. The Lever resolution, as amended, had some of the dates contained in mine, as to the time of reporting. It was reported and passed the House late in February and is now the law.

Mr. Chairman, I did not quibble with the committee as to whose name the resolution should bear, Mr. LEVER's or mine. I was anxious that the law be passed. I knew that it was meeting the just demands of the cotton growers of the South, and that it would enable the cotton producer to sell his cotton intelligently, because he would have the information necessary regarding the amount of raw cotton on hand at the mills. The March report will give him the number of bales of old cotton on hand in the United States, and this will be valuable information in determining the size of the cotton crop for the coming year.

Time was when the New England manufacturer would help the "bears" in the exchange by claiming to have all the cotton that they would need for quite a while. The producer did not know—he had no way of knowing. The producer became frightened and would sell his cotton as rapidly as he could market it, but since he knows by these reports how much cotton is on hand he can judge for himself what the market ought to be and govern himself in the light of this information. It has enabled him to see the folly of rushing his cotton to market and selling it at destructive prices. With this information about the supply of cotton at the cotton mills, he can know something of what the real demand for real cotton will be. Mr. Chairman, when I brought this matter to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture, and when I urged this legislation in the House, it was my purpose to do simple justice by the cotton producers of the South. It was my desire to do the same for them that Congress had done for the manufacturer of cotton. It had given the manufacturer of cotton, in the crop report and in the ginners' report, all the information that he needed to run his business intelligently; and it was nothing but simple justice that the producer of cotton should have the benefit of a government report telling him, from time to time, the amount of baled cotton on hand in the United States. He needed this in order to run his business intelligently. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to injure the cotton mills, but it was my desire, purely and wholly, to be as just to the man who makes the stuff that feeds the cotton mills as the Government has been to the man who owns the cotton mill. The manufacturer knows how the cotton crop is progressing in the spring and summer, for the crop report tells him. He knows how much cotton is being ginned in the ginning season, for the gingers' report tells him twice a month. He has all the information that he could wish—all that is necessary for his business—but before the passage of this law that I suggested, requiring the reports on the amount of baled cotton on hand at the cotton mills of the country, the manufacturer had the producer in the dark. He knew nothing, absolutely nothing, about the supply of cotton in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is what one of the newspapers of Wall street, in the gentleman's [Mr. PAYNE] State of New York, had to say about me at that time:

> Expressing the wish of the southern cotton planters, Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama, introduced in Congress the other day a joint resolution instructing the Director of the Census to ascertain from the manufacturers of cotton in the United States, every sixty days, the amount that has been purchased and manufactured during the previous two months. That would be a fine thing for the cotton planters. The information would enable them to know just how much cotton the manufacturers had on hand, just how large the supply at any particular time happened to be. Knowing this, the planters could act more intelligently in sending their cotton to the market. Having the cotton manufacturer where the hair—or cotton—was short, planters could make him pay what price they liked.
> Naturally the manufacturers do not want to give up any such information. As a matter of fact, the Heflin resolution is paternalistic, populistic, and somewhat inclined to be anarchistic.

So, Mr. Chairman, for doing for the cotton producer just exactly what Congress has done for the cotton manufacturer, I am denounced by papers in New York as being a Populist, a paternalist, and an anarchist. The criticism of these papers is the best evidence that I am in the right and doing my duty.

Last year, even after the law for obtaining the amount of cotton on hand went into effect, some of our cotton manufacturers, in September, claimed that they had enough old cotton to run them for a long time, but the government report on baled cotton for November 1, 1909, the first report under this new law, knocked this claim of the manufacturers to pieces and the southern farmer and merchant, for the first time in the history of our country, saw behind the doors of the manufacturer and cotton advanced in price; then in November they gave out the statement that with what old cotton they had on hand and what new cotton they had bought they would have enough to run the mills without buying any more, but the January report on baled cotton, by the Government, disclosed the fact that the bulk of the cotton sold had been shipped to foreign countries—that is, it was not to be found in this country. Then what happened? Men with money—big money—bought cotton as an investment. Patten bought 3,000,000 bales. They had information that told them the condition in the cotton world.

The producer had the information that he needed to enable him to sell his cotton intelligently, and the man with money to invest in a safe thing had the information to show him his opportunity, and for one time the theory of a spot-cotton exchange was put into practice. The dealing was in cotton, and it took cotton to fill the contract. For the first time producer and manufacturer stood on equal footing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So in bringing this matter to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture and discussing it in the House, it was my purpose to give the cotton farmer and merchant of the South the information that they needed and were entitled to—the same character of information that was given to the manufacturer long ago. If it was fair to give to the manufacturer crop reports and ginners' reports, which furnished him all the information that he needed about the cotton crop, it was equally fair to give to the cotton producer some information regarding the movement and consumption of cotton and to inform him about the supply of cotton in the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Before this proposition of gathering statistics as to the amount of baled cotton in the United States became the law, the manufacturer of cotton had all the information that the Government could afford to help him run his business, and the cotton producer had none, absolutely none, except that manufactured by the "bears" in the gambling exchange, and the information that they gave him was given for the purpose of making him sell his cotton as rapidly as he could possibly market it, and this he did for many years at low and destructive prices. The manufacturers could claim that they had enough cotton to run them for quite a long time, and the "bears" would spread the news all over the South, and the farmer who produced cotton for the world had no way of telling how much was on hand at the mills, how to get at the truth of the situation. He groped in the dark, helpless in the hands of "bears" and spinners; but now, since justice, in a measure, has been done him, he is enabled to get at the truth by the aid of a government report.

Two things operated to raise the price of cotton—the fact that England realized from accurate crop reports as made by farmers, men who knew the actual condition of the crop, that the crop was short, and the fact that the spinners here knew that the November report on baled cotton would disclose the fact that the bulk of the crop was going and had gone abroad. Then, what happened? Actual cotton was in demand, and a day was coming—and that day was November 1—when the truth of the amount of actual cotton available in the United States would be made known. We had simply devised the means for obtaining the truth, and only the knowledge of the truth regarding the cotton business will bring about the operation of the law of supply and demand, and this is what the producer of cotton has been struggling for for years and years.

I do not object to the exchange that does a legitimate business—that means to deliver, and have delivered, the commodity in which it deals. I am heartily in favor of such an exchange. Such an exchange is conducted in Bremen, Germany. If a man contracts for a thousand bales of cotton, he is certain to have a thousand bales of cotton delivered to him. This helps the producer, for he must furnish the cotton. Such an exchange is a useful thing; and when its contracts are made and filled, it takes real stuff to fill them, and the producer is helped by their operation. A horse is a useful animal, but you would not harness him up, hitch him to a buggy, pull the bridle off, and let him go about at will with your family in the buggy. An exchange is all right if it is properly harnessed and controlled—made to conform to certain just rules—but it is not safe for the producer to be left at the mercy of the "bear" speculator when that speculator has the moral support and financial backing of the spinning interests of the world. Hence the necessity for certain regulation of the exchange. I have seen the price of cotton futures in the exchange a cent and a half lower than the price of real cotton in the local market.

The representatives of the Farmers' Union are here. They came to urge legislation that will give the farmer an honest and stable market for his cotton and grain and free him from the uncertainty of the gambling exchange. Just before coming to Washington Mr. C. S. Barrett, president of the Farmers' Union, issued an address December 29, 1909, a part of which I will read:

> In January of the new year the Farmers' Union, represented by national officers, by experts, and by state officials, the country over, will assemble in Washington, there to make a determined and organized fight against the New York Cotton Exchange, and all other like aggregations that use its methods, or variations of them, to pick the pockets of the rural population of this country.
> The time has come for the politicians, the Representatives, and Senators who profess friendship for the farmer to show their friendship in something more substantial than promissory notes compounded of language and evasion. We want action against the New York Cotton Exchange. We demand action against the New York Cotton Exchange.

We have at last learned how to go about the enforcement of the rights of American farmers, and that is by using the ballot as a bullet.

To that end at the coming session we expect to keep our eyes on every Member of Congress, seeing how far his professions of friendship are borne out in action upon the floor and marking indelibly those Congressmen aligned directly or indirectly against the farmers' interests. We have secured data, minute and detailed, regarding the methods of the New York Cotton Exchange, and we are prepared to submit it to any congressional committee, with a demand for action thereupon.

But we also expect to push this war to a successful conclusion, regardless of who is lined up with us or against us. Playing lottery with the products upon which the individual and collective prosperity of our people depends must cease. Economically it is wrong; ethically it is wrong.

Betting on the Nation's products is an indefensible practice that reaches into the pockets of yourself; that takes clothes from the backs of your families; that takes food from their mouths; and that keeps education from the children who are to carry on your name in this world.

I am heartily in favor of this legislation, Mr. Chairman. I have advocated it for years. If we can destroy gambling in fictitious stuff, we will establish all over the South spot-cotton exchanges, and then the producer will have some voice in fixing the price of cotton.

The "bear" gamblers in the exchange have insisted for years that if we did not permit them to gamble on our cotton we would not know what it is worth; that we must rely on a concern that does not use a pound of cotton to grant us a reasonable price. We have had time and again an example of the gamblers' generosity; especially do I recall a time when the producer and merchant offered no resistance—they did not know how to resist—in fact, they trusted the exchange implicitly, and what did it do? It reduced the price of cotton to 4 cents per pound, far below the cost of production, and bankrupted thousands of farmers and merchants in the South. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Hereafter the producer of cotton is going to be a factor in fixing the price of cotton.

Senator John T. Morgan, in the last speech that he ever made in Alabama, said:

The day will come when the producer will fix the price of cotton at his own door.

Mr. Chairman, what the producer wants and must have, ultimately, is something stable in cotton prices. The cotton industry is in a hazardous condition when it must depend on the mood of this or that set of gamblers. We have seen recently, when the cotton crop was nearly all sold—when real cotton cut no figure at all in cotton transactions—the "bear" gamblers in the New York Exchange in one week reduce the price of cotton $15 per bale. Just think of that! In that transaction no real cotton was bought or sold—no real cotton delivered.

A majority of the regular members of the exchange are always "bears," and they represent the spinning interests. Now, it is known to all men that the spinner wants to buy cotton just as cheaply as he can. Well, if the "bear" represents the spinner, and he is nine times out of ten the controlling power on the gambling exchange, how is it possible for the producer, who wants a reasonable price for his cotton, to have a fair deal, when his deadly enemy, the "bear," decides the case?

The producer does not demand and he does not want outrageous prices for his cotton. He does want and he does demand fair prices and living profits.

The argument of the cotton gamblers that we would have no market but for them, that they must tell us what it is worth, is rot of the commonest order. The pig-iron industry is vast and it is worth millions, and yet there is no gambling in pig iron as there is in cotton. Still, the pig-iron business flourishes, in spite of the failure of a gambling exchange to aid it.

There is no speculation in futures on wool, and yet the woolen industry is worth millions and millions, and always does a flourishing business. No speculative exchange tells us the price of wool. There is no speculation in futures on hay, and yet the hay crop in the United States is greater than the cotton crop, and there is a good hay market, and the gambling exchange does not tell the hay grower what his hay will be worth.

Now, then, if the man who owns pig iron, and the man who owns wool, and the man who owns hay, all have sense enough to demand and obtain a reasonable price, year after year, for their product without the interference of a gambling exchange, is it not reasonable that the southern farmer and merchant can and will demand a fair price for cotton? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss a few other things.

While a member of the Committee on Agriculture I introduced a bill and got it favorably reported by the committee, to prevent any employee of the Government from selling information regarding the cotton crop to the cotton gamblers of the country, and to prevent making false reports or giving out any information before the day fixed to publish this information. I introduced a resolution in the House denying the correctness of the cotton-crop estimate made by the Department of Agriculture for 1907, and I proved before the committee that the department had overestimated the crop. The evidence finally showed that it was estimated at 600,000 bales too much. I helped to pass the Burleson law standardizing cotton grades—taking this power away from the New York exchange. I amended the law regarding crop reports so that the farmer himself should be consulted and not have to rely on other classes of men to make these reports, as was done before. The law, as I wrote it, provides and now reads: "Shall be gathered, so far as practicable, from practical farmers;" and I said if you should ask about the practice that obtained in courts you would not consult a farmer or a doctor, you would ask a lawyer. If you wanted to know the facts about an epidemic of disease in a community you would not ask a farmer or a lawyer, but you would ask a doctor. And I said if you want to know the true condition about growing crops you should consult the honest farmers of the South, and you will get the truth. [Applause.]

And I first suggested and helped to secure the law requiring reports on baled cotton on hand from time to time in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I mention these things that the House and the country may know that, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I was alive to the interest of my people and trying to do something of value for the farmers of the South. With no desire to boast of what I have been able to accomplish for them, I challenge the Speaker of this House to name a single member on that committee who has done more than I have for southern agriculture. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, my service on that committee was such, and I refer to this with pride, that President Barrett, of the Farmers' Union of America, wrote to the Speaker and asked him to reappoint me. In that letter Mr. Barrett said:

Mr. HEFLIN has shown himself in strong sympathy with the farming people of this country, North as well as South.

And he also said that I was giving and had given great study to "agricultural matters." If I had not been faithful on the Committee on Agriculture, could I have had such a testimonial as that?

President Jordan, of the Southern Cotton Association, wrote the Speaker of the House asking him to reappoint me on that committee; and he said in that letter:

Mr. HEFLIN has always taken great interest in all matters pertaining to the development of the agricultural interests.

And he said further, that my appointment would meet the hearty indorsement of the people of this entire section. If I had been unfaithful on that committee, could I have had such an indorsement as that?

President Cameron, of the Farmers' National Congress, wrote to the Speaker of this House and asked him to reappoint me on the Committee on Agriculture, and in that letter he said:

His services on that committee have been satisfactory, and your reappointment of him will be agreeable to our agricultural interests.

If I had been unfaithful on that committee, could I have received such an indorsement as that?

Hon. CHAMP CLARK, minority leader, wrote me that if he were allowed to name the Democrats on the committees, as had been the custom heretofore, it would give him pleasure to put me back on the Committee on Agriculture, and I informed the Speaker of Mr. CLARK'S wishes. So, Mr. Chairman, I have the proud consolation of feeling and knowing that the Speaker of this House did not refuse to reappoint me because I had been derelict in my duty or unfaithful to the farming interests of my country; but because of my advocacy of certain right principles and my activity in the interest of certain laws that would help the farmer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is what the newspapers said at the time he undertook to punish me for doing what I knew was right:

One of the most glaring punishments in Mr. CANNON'S list is the removal of HEFLIN, of Alabama, from the Committee on Agriculture. The Alabama delegation is pretty angry over this reported action of the Speaker. Mr. HEFLIN was indorsed for this place on the Agricultural Committee by the National Farmers' Congress, the National Farmers' Union, and the Southern Cotton Association. The removal of HEFLIN is believed to have been due to the fact that some time ago he was the leading spirit in a movement against grain and cotton speculation.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

In doing my duty by the agricultural interests, I had antagonized certain interests that did not want me to go back upon that committee, and it is very evident that their wishes prevailed with the Speaker. The Speaker never even intimated that there was objection to me from any source.

Mr. Chairman, in depriving me of the power that I had and was using on that committee in the interest of the farmer, the Speaker was serving the enemies of agriculture, so the paper says, and in refusing to reappoint me he disregarded the wishes and recommendations of the three greatest farmers' organizations in the United States. While the Speaker can pack committees and remove Members who think for themselves and have the courage to refuse to do his bidding, I thank God that we still have the right to speak our convictions on this floor, and exercising that right to-day, I am giving the truth of the situation to this House and to the country. If the changes in the rules of the House continue to be made, taking power from the House and conferring it on the Speaker, the day will come, if the Republicans remain in power, when no Member will be permitted to criticise the Speaker's conduct, and then we will be unable to get the truth of conditions as they exist here to the country. But the people are waking up, and the evils of Cannonism are becoming known to the country, and I am proud of this fact, Mr. Chairman, that the editor of one of the magazines that has done so much to educate the people on the tyranny and arbirary action of the Speaker wrote me a letter that my speech discussing the Speaker's way of suppressing legislation was a distinct contribution to the literature of the country against Cannonism.

Mr. Chairman, I am not the only man that the Speaker has removed or failed to reappoint on the Committee on Agriculture. I have in mind now particularly a gentleman who incurred the displeasure of the Speaker in the Fifty-ninth Congress, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. No man since I have been in Congress has been more untiring in his efforts to materially aid the agricultural interests of the South than the gentleman from Mississippi.

Wherever the interest of the farmer could be found, there could the gentleman from Mississippi be found also. The Speaker refused to reappoint the gentleman [Mr. CANDLER] on that committee in the Sixtieth Congress, and no other reason can be found except the devotion of the gentleman from Mississippi to the interest of agriculture, the faithful discharge of his duty to the agricultural interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and had secured a unanimous report on my bill to prevent the selling or giving away of statistics regarding cotton, on the 25th day of May, 1908, I requested unanimous consent to call up the bill and put it on its passage, and the RECORD of May 25 shows that this is what happened:

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the passage of the bill (H. R. 21847) to prevent falsifications in the collection and compilation of agricultural statistics and the unauthorized issuance and publication of the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person in the employment of the Government of the United States to divulge, or cause to be divulged, or in any way to give out, or cause to be given out, publish, or make known to anyone not authorized by law to have or receive the same, any information, statistical or otherwise, acquired by virtue of his employment by or official position with any department of the Government of the United States regarding the reports on crop conditions prior to the hour that the crop estimate is published as is now required by law.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person in the employment of the Government of the United States to divulge, or cause to be divulged, or in any way to give out, or cause to be given out, publish, or make known to anyone not authorized by law to have or receive the same, any information, statistical or otherwise, obtained by virtue of his employment by or official position with the Government of the United States regarding the amount of cotton ginned prior to the day fixed by law for the publication of the ginners' report obtained by the Census Department.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States of America, whose duties require the collection, compilation, or report of statistics or information relative to the products of the soil, knowingly to collect, compile, or report for issuance or issue any false statistics or information relative to such products.

"SEC. 4. That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than five years, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. PAYNE. No; this matter is thoroughly understood by the House. I object to the passage of the legislation and want the opportunity to vote against it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. Chairman, I was astounded at the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the floor leader on the Republican side, and I have not yet been able to reconcile the gentleman's act on that day with what I conceived to be the duty of a Representative on this floor toward securing honest legislation. In view of the fact that it was a cotton gambler in the gentleman's own State of New York who bought information about cotton from an employee in the Agricultural Department in 1904 or 1905, it comes in bad taste for the gentleman to object to the passage of this legislation. But I was determined to do all in my power to secure this legislation, so I circulated a petition addressed to the Speaker, requesting him to allow me or some one else to call up this bill and put it on its passage. That petition was signed by nearly a hundred Members, and I gave it to the Speaker. Here is the petition:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned Members of the House, respectfully request that you recognize Mr. HEFLIN or some one else to move a suspension of the rules and pass the bill above mentioned. It is an important measure, and ought to pass at this session of Congress.

After this petition was presented, thinking that the Speaker would certainly allow us to pass the bill, I arose, and the RECORD of May 28 shows that this is what occurred:

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair had reason to suppose there would be objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was going to move to suspend the rules. I move to suspend the rules and pass H. R. 21847. It is a bill to prevent falsifications in the collection and compilation of agricultural statistics and the unauthorized issuance and publication of the same.

The SPEAKER. The House is waiting for a bill, the original of which was with the committee, and will soon be here. The Chair, to be entirely frank with the gentleman, at this time at least can not recognize the gentleman to move to suspend the rules.

This record discloses a secret and reveals a deplorable situation in the House. There was the Speaker announcing from the chair that he had "reason to suppose there would be objection," and he refused to allow me, after nearly 100 Members had requested it, to even ask of the House unanimous consent to call up the bill. I was curious to know why he had made the announcement that he had "reason to believe there would be objection." So I went up to the Speaker's stand and told him that my bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Agriculture; that it was a good bill and ought to become the law. And what do you suppose he told me? He told me that he had promised the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the same Member who had objected before, that he would not allow me to call up that bill during his, Mr. PAYNE's, absence from the hall. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Think of that! The Speaker of the American House of Representatives entering into an agreement with another Member of the House to deprive a Representative on this floor of his rights, and by secret agreement preventing this honest and just legislation. By that secret agreement that honest legislation at that session was defeated, and in order to accomplish it the Speaker had refused the request of nearly 100 Members. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

After I had tried to obtain permission from the Speaker to call up that bill I decided to pursue another course. So the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] was kind enough to yield me some of his time and I managed to say a few words on my bill in the House, and here is what I said:

Mr. Speaker, I want the country to know that there is no law now to punish an employee of the Government for obtaining and selling statistical information to the cotton and grain gamblers of this country. There is no law to punish them for giving out false information on the day fixed by law for publishing crop reports, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, we can pass my bill in one minute, if the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection. Speculation in the coming crop will amount to a great deal to the speculators, and in the absence of some law to protect agricultural statistics the farmers are at the mercy of the smart rascals of the gambling exchanges. If a man can be found like Holmes, who will sell this information, the gamblers will rejoice and the man can not be punished.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the objection to the passage of my bill was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the Republican floor leader. But, sir, I was pained to see that not a single Member on that side would rise in his place and ask him to withdraw his objection and allow the bill to pass. There are some clever Republicans here, but, sir, you have lost your courage in miserable submission to your floor leader's will. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] takes a position, you dare not oppose him. No deliberative body on earth was ever afflicted with such an utter disregard of the people's will as that side of the House displays here day after day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, what happens? In order to keep me from giving the truth of the situation to the country, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] arose, and here is what he said and here is what occurred:

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will suspend. The point of order is made that the gentleman is not addressing his remarks to the matter pending before the House, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, since the Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from New York, I think the country will understand the Republican party's attitude on this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This record, Mr. Chairman, discloses the purpose on the part of the Speaker of the House and the Republican floor leader, Mr. PAYNE, to stifle and defeat this just legislation and to keep the real facts from being discussed, so that they could keep these facts from the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two about "Cannonism," and I want to offer some Republican testimony to prove my case.

Who is the Member over on the right,
With arm uplifted and fist clinched tight,
Whose arraignment of Cannonism would do justice to old Horace?
Listen, my friends, his name is NORRIS.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

He, too, is a Republican, and here is what he says:

When our forefathers framed the Constitution that part of it nearest and dearest to the people was the part which provided for the House of Representatives. It was the only place in the national fabric where the people had a direct voice and vote. To-day, as far as the enactment of legislation is concerned, the House of Representatives bears about the same relation to the National Government as the appendix does to the human body—it has no well-recognized function. For all practical purposes our National Government, like Gaul of old, is divided into three parts—the Senate, the President, and the Speaker.

This perversion of the real intent and object of the Constitution has been brought about so gradually and quietly that until recently the people have not understood the method of its accomplishment. That the Speaker possesses a power second only to the President has been well understood by the people at large for several years. That by some mysterious power he controls the House of Representatives as with a rod of iron, and at will moves its Members like pawns about the political checkerboard of national legislation, is known of all men.

The existence of this authority was accepted by the country as a matter of fact, and many people believed that by some constitutional provision or some enactment of statute he had been given the power that he had been exercising. Members of the House of Representatives, who first stood off in amazement and wondered at the system of control, and then searched for the source of this power, soon discovered that the Constitution and the statutes enacted thereunder had given to the Speaker no authority whatever, but that all the power he possessed he obtained entirely and exclusively from the rules of the House. Even in these rules it was not possible to find any specific enactment that gave to him in direct terms the wonderful authority over men and measures that he seemed to be in possession of. His control seemed to be absolute and almost without limit, and yet the specific authorization of his power was more or less a mystery and a secret.

The Speaker, under existing rules, had the sole power of making such appointments, and by virtue thereof he controlled, to a great extent, the political destiny of every Member. By this authority he rewarded the faithful and punished those who refused to obey.

This, then, was the secret of the Speaker's power. It enabled him to influence the individual Member, to intimidate the committee, to control the House, to hold up the President, and to defy the country. The country has condemned the man more than the rule. While the removal of the man from the office is very desirable, the change of the rule is absolutely necessary if we would retain any vestige of representative government in national affairs.

This testimony of the gentleman from Nebraska, a Republican, discloses an awful condition in the people's House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I wish to put another distinguished Republican on the stand. Here is what he says in Success Magazine:

THE END OF CANNONISM.

[By J. C. Welliver, of the Washington Times.]

FIFTY INSURGENT REPUBLICANS IN CONGRESS.

The surpassingly important fact to-day is that the end of the Cannon era is at hand. That fact has been made as plain as reasoning man could wish since the opening of the long session of Congress. The return to Washington of the warring forces with their loins girt up for the resumption of the fight has been followed fast by developments which leave no room for doubt of the event.

The last session—the tariff session—saw the insurgents able to muster barely more than a score of insurgent Republicans. Now they have returned to the attack, confidently claiming that they have half a hundred. They list more than twice as many as they could count last session. Why these gains, when there has been no change in the personnel of the House?

Simply because the Members have "been to the country" and have learned what is in the minds of the people. They have been out among their constituents. They have felt out the sentiment of all classes of the community. They have learned that there is just one proposition on which the preponderance is overwhelming, and that is a demand that an end be put to the rule of the House by CANNON.

* * * * * * *

It is CANNON v. The United States. CANNON himself forced the issue. His challenge was promptly accepted by the Republican leaders of the West. Cannonism has therefore reached the last stage, the beginning of the end. No petty politics, no temporary victories of trick and stratagem, not even his final frantic effort to appear as a friend of progress, can now save CANNON. The Middle West, supported by the honest, healthy thought of 45 States, is against him. He is doomed.

* * * * * * *

Reports of the same purport came from all sections. "If I want to come back to Congress next session I've got to pledge myself to vote against CANNON," one supporter of the Speaker declared, with sincere regret. "And I've got to tell 'Uncle JOE' just that."

* * * * * * *

Among the "regulars" there early developed a strong sentiment that CANNON must take himself out of the speakership consideration for the Sixty-second Congress, or gravely endanger the Republican party. More than that, it was agreed that the Speaker must be told this in the plainest terms.

"If the Republicans control the next House, it will be because CANNON will have been eliminated before the election," is the common expression.

* * * * * * *

Even now the seeing men of the old CANNON régime realize that the end is at hand. They know he can never again be elected Speaker, and they are preparing to save the machine and the rules and the paraphernalia of legislative asphyxiation by sacrificing CANNON and taking up some other man of his very truest kidney as their candidate for the gavel. With them it is the system, not the man who may chance to head it. "'The king is dead! Long live the king'—and keep us as his courtiers and ministers and satellites!" That is their motto.

These in due time will find courage to brave the wrath of the Iron Duke of Danville, and tell him he must get out of the way. Then they will take TAWNEY, or SMITH of Iowa, or STEVENS of Minnesota, or LOUDENSLAGER, or PAYNE, or some other well-trained old wolf of the CANNON pack, rig him out for the nonce in a shimmering lamb's fleece of insurgent apparel, and invite all the lambs to enter the trap by electing this masquerader to represent the new régime in the chair. God help the cause of parliamentary reform if it shall fall into the hands of such friends. It is just as important that Cannonism shall not choose the next Speaker as that CANNON shall not succeed himself.

Or ask yourself what would happen in England if Messrs. Gompers, Mitchell, and Morrison were Englishmen, sentenced to jail without the right of jury trial. For years and years Cannonism has blocked the way of legislation to limit and define judiciary powers in contempt cases.

These are some of the differences between the progress of other countries and the stagnation of our own, and if you would have the answer, it is in one word:

Cannonism!

Do you know that under some recent legislation in Germany no privately owned coal mine may be opened in the Empire? Compare that with the reckless waste and monopolization of our remaining coal deposits.

THE NATION CRIES FOR RIDDANCE FROM CANNON.

The income tax is established as a basic feature in almost every nation's fiscal scheme. We are just setting about on the probably futile effort to amend our Constitution so that we may establish that tax.

Everybody agrees that our money system needs thorough overhauling and modernizing. The greatest and richest country on earth, we have a currency system that is a standing menace to the financial stability of the whole commercial world, and yet we are afraid to permit an attempt to improve it, because we see prospect that the work would be dominated by ALDRICH and CANNON, and nobody is willing to trust the patriotism of the one or the intelligence of the other in such a vital work.

* * * * * * *

And when the fight is won, when the House has resumed its representative character, when its committees are once more named with the view to facilitate rather than to smother business, when the Committee on Rules shall administer the rules rather than the garrote, when Cannonism and Toryism have been routed and progress and enlightenment shall hold sway—then the country will go back to that imposing list of the things left undone when they ought to have been done.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S ATTITUDE HAS CHANGED SINCE MARCH.

There could be no more suggestive indication of the drift of public opinion than is afforded by a study of the attitude of President Taft during his recent tour. Last March the President employed his utmost influence to save CANNON from defeat. But for his support CANNON would have gone down.

And yet, from beginning to end of his 13,000 mile swing around the circle, the President spoke no word of indorsement of CANNON.

* * * * * * *

It means, simply, that Taft will never again give his support to CANNON. CANNON'S forces understand that perfectly. They realize the full significance of it.

The CANNON power is crumbling. It is tottering through the last reach in its race. No doubt can be entertained on this point by one who has studied the developments since Congress returned to the capital.

* * * * * * *

The country is determined to make an end of CANNON rule and of the CANNON rules. It knows now all too well the narrowness, the bigotry, the vindictiveness, and vengefulness, the utter disregard for public interest or popular opinion with which CANNON holds his sway. It has read and believes the scathing indictment which Representative FOWLER, of New Jersey, addressed to the Speaker. CANNON had deposed FOWLER from the chairmanship of the Committee on Banking and Currency, because FOWLER had been guilty of the heinous offense of knowing something about the currency problem and of standing for his opinions, even when they interfered with the plans of CANNON and ALDRICH. The Speaker's vengeance against FOWLER was only typical. Every insurgent was punished for his insurgency when committees were announced by the Speaker on the closing day of the special session.

COOPER was taken from the headship of the Committee on Insular Affairs, where he had done magnificent service in helping President Taft to secure a measure of self-government for the archipelago. NORRIS lost his place on the powerful Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and so on through the list. Utterly reckless of the public interests, of the fitness or the service of men, CANNON punished every luckless one who dared oppose his despotism. It was as if that power of naming committees had been given him as the older Bourbons believed the scepter had come to them, by divine right, to be wielded for absolutely no other purpose than the gratification of personal whims and piques. Small wonder the country has made up its mind to end such conditions. The end is in sight.

Just after the last election the poet laureate of the Republican party—in the Washington Herald, I believe it was—said:

Who was it, when shot and shell
In fierce assault around him fell,
Stood by his guns and gave 'em —ll?
CANNON.

[Laughter.]

But now, Mr. Chairman—

Since that battle's fought and o'er,
And the country on CANNON is exceedingly sore,
Republicans on that side galore
Swear they'll vote for him nevermore.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Some are sincere, I do believe,
From his tyranny this House they would relieve;
But some, I fear, the country would deceive
Just on another election eve.

[Laughter.]

For this one thing they've come to know,
That Cannonism is doomed—must go;
So now we behold an amusing show,
They are falling out with Uncle Joe.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The very conditions they now oppose
From Republican evils in this House arose;
And to the country it all clearly shows
That the Republican party caused all these woes.

[Laughter and applause.]

So, it's CANNON and Cannonism we fight,
In the name of justice and the rules of right.
Decent parliamentary procedure in the place of might;
Courage, my friends, the victory's in sight.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Who is that redheaded man by the aisle,
Who faces the Speaker and grimly smiles
When the gavel falls like a ponderous rock,
And sighs "Nevermore?" His name's MURDOCK.

[Laughter.]

He is an insurgent Republican praying for deliverance from Cannonism.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in giving honor and credit to whom honor and credit are due for the patriotic service of exposing Cannonism to the country.

I saw a man on this floor, in the Fifty-ninth Congress, courageously assail Cannonism. Single handed and alone, he went into this work, and he described the Speaker as a czar and denounced the rules of this House as arbitrary and tyrannical. His voice trembling with righteous indignation, he said:

I have undertaken to show that ours is no longer a representative government; that in defiance of the Constitution and the rules the Speaker exercises an absolute veto power over all legislation proposed here; that instead of being, as the Constitution contemplates he should, the servant of the House, the Speaker has constituted himself its master. I have laid out for my task to make it an issue before the country whether he shall not be required to give back to the people their free representative government.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD said, March 16, 1906:

No Member can submit any matter to a vote of the House until he shall have first sought and found favor in your sight. The Constitution contemplates that the Speaker shall be the servant of the House. In defiance of the Constitution you have made yourself its master. You have organized every committee so that no bill can be reported without your consent. Unless you are willing, no Member can move to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill and take it up in the House. You subject the rights and destinies of this great people to the dictates of your own unbridled will.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my insurgent Republican friends and to the country that the man who started the fight on Cannonism, the man to whom most credit is due, is that gallant Democrat from the State of Missouri, Mr. SHACKLEFORD. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I must close. In a speech in this House, discussing the evils of your high tariff, I said that your tariff taxes would drive from the homes of the plain people the simple necessities of life; and what do we see to-day? Trusts have sprung up under your tariff protection and they arbitrarily fix the price of food in every market in the country. All classes of people, not especially within the circle of governmental favoritism, are driven to pitiful self-denial. In different parts of the country people are forced to quit eating meat on account of the high price. They are forming clubs and registering a solemn vow that they will deny themselves of the necessary meat on which to live. This great army of the plain people in their clubs are combating an evil that this Government permits to exist to the injury and distress of the people. An evil that the Democratic party has been fighting all these years. It has grown, gathering up and taking away the comforts and conveniences of life, and now this trust monster takes from the moderately well-to-do a portion of the necessities of life and threatens with starvation thousands of America's struggling poor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if these people should assemble and agree to quit the use of the things that they did not need—the luxuries of life—and should determine to be more economical, it would be a refreshing sight to behold. But we see a free people hourly doomed to pay the price that bribes their liberties away—the prey of the greed of conscienceless men driven from the fields of a worthy existence and facing a state of industrial slavery equal to that of the European peasant.

This Republican monster of the meat trust has carried on his work of robbing the people, of creating hunger and distress in the various States of the Union, and now he flaunts his ghastly flag in the faces of the people of the capital city. Here where the lawmaking body is in session; here where the Supreme Court sits and the President dwells, with all the powers of the Federal Government centered about him, the meat trust is pinching with hunger nearly half a million people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The poor clerks and government employees are forming clubs and swearing they will eat no meat for months to come. If some outlaw should hold up a train carrying provisions into any locality in the United States and the people should suffer because of this man's conduct, he would be put in the penitentiary, where he ought to be; and if a trust magnate, by reason of unreasonable prices of foodstuff, overreaches the purchasing power of the people, he ought to be locked up. But, oh, no! There is one code of conduct for the big-moneyed man and quite a different code of conduct for the poor man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Thirteen years of unbroken reign of the Republican party—House, Senate, and President. Tariff barons and trust magnates are holding high carnival in the Republic of our fathers and pinching with hunger millions of Americans. Day by day, those who fatten on the legislative favors of Congress, obtaining the power with which to rob and oppress the people, show more and more their utter disregard for the rights and liberties of the plain people. Their subsidized newspapers brand as a demagogue the man who opposes their corrupt and misery-breeding measures.

The Republic exists for the benefit and happiness of the citizen. It was never intended that this Government, born of the courage and sacrifices of our fathers and christened in the name of a justice-loving people, should become the handy instrument by which the crafty and avaricious should sap the lifeblood of honest effort and paralyze the hopes and energies of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The man who enjoys the comforts and conveniences of life and then robs his fellowman of the simple necessities of life is by far a worse criminal than the poor fellow who snatches a loaf of bread from the bakery and takes it home to feed his starving children. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LAMB. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the first section of the bill which I have introduced establishes a bureau of highways in the Department of Agriculture. The second section provides for a cooperation of work in the building of highways between the States, or civil subdivisions of the States on one side and the Federal Government on the other. The third section provides that the bureau shall consist of three commissioners, two of whom to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; one of said commissioners to belong to the dominant political party, and the other to be appointed from the largest minority political party; the third to be an army engineer with rank not above that of captain, to be detailed by the President of the United States, and that said commissioners shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. Section 4 provides that a State or a civil subdivision of a State, after complying with the act, may apply for and receive aid from the Government in the improvement of public highways. Section 5 fixes the terms and conditions upon which any State or civil subdivision of a State may apply for and receive aid from the Government by establishing the following facts: First, that the highway sought to be improved is of sufficient importance, taking into account its location, travel, and traffic thereon, including the carriage and delivery of United States mail. Second, that a right of way has been secured for the highway. Third, that when it is improved that the repairs of said highway shall be kept and maintained by the States or subdivision of the States free from any cost to the United States. Fourth, that the State or a subdivision of the State has signified its willingness and desire to improve its highways by first having said highway surveyed and an estimate of the cost thereof prepared, together with a map, plat, or chart thereof, filed in the court having jurisdiction of the highways in the State or civil subdivision thereof, and (providing that all this preliminary cost shall be borne by the State or civil subdivision thereof) and providing that when these things are duly certified to the bureau of highways, established in the Department of Agriculture, together with the fact that the State or civil subdivision of the State has by taxation or otherwise appropriated not less than one-half the money necessary to build or improve said highway, that then the bureau of highways, established in the Department of Agriculture, shall mark said report "approved," or if the bureau does not approve the report that then the said bureau shall have the highway sought to be improved resurveyed, together with the estimated cost thereof, and it shall then be the duty of the bureau to mark said report "approved."

Section 6 provides that upon a full and complete compliance with section 5 of the act one half of the expense of building and improving said highway shall be borne by the United States and the other half shall be borne by the State or civil subdivisions thereof, and that not more than 80 per cent of the work shall be paid as it progresses. Section 7 provides for an appropriation of $30,000,000 to carry the provisions of the bill into effect, one-third of this amount to be available in 1910, one-third in 1911, and one-third in 1912, and that the act shall apply only to post-roads.

Mr. Chairman, the question of internal improvements has been a burning one from the foundation of the Government down to the present, although we have reached our one hundred and twenty-ninth national milestone. This question is as much alive to-day as it was then, and it will continue to agitate the minds of the people until the question is settled and settled right. The Constitution reserves the right of improving rivers flowing between the States or from one State or Territory to another State or Territory, and under that part of the Constitution giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States, Congress has almost from the foundation of the Government to the present time continued to make large appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. The Constitution further reserves the right to the Federal Government to establish post-roads upon the highways of the United States, and by these two constitutional provisions a complete monopoly is given to the Federal Government, if it sees fit to enforce it, to both regulate and control traffic upon rivers and the highways of the country, and the Constitution having reserved this right, in my humble judgment it is time that Congress was fulfilling its constitutional obligations to the people along these lines. One of these obligations Congress has endeavored to fulfill; almost since the day the Government was organized to the present time Congress has continued to make appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which now run well up into the hundreds of millions. The other obligation, that of improving or even aiding in the improvement of the highways of the country, Congress has not entered upon any well-defined policy in the way of making appropriations for this purpose.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the agricultural bill now pending before the House, under the head of "Office of Public Roads," carries an appropriation of $114,240. This appropriation is not intended for a cooperation of the improvement of roads between the States on one side and the Federal Government on the other, but as the language of the bill itself indicates, it is for the purpose of disseminating knowledge among the States concerning the best methods and manner of building and improving highways in the States. This appropriation is not a drop in the bucket as to what is needed along this line, but it shows the beginning of what I trust will, in a few years, be the golden ending of this much-needed legislation. There is as much constitutional warrant for the Government to appropriate money for the purpose of improving the highways of the country, especially its post-roads, as there is for the Government to appropriate millions of dollars for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and certainly there would be as much justice and equity in it, because it would aid a deserving class of citizens of our country who always have labored under great stress and difficulty, and who, notwithstanding the difficulties under which they have labored, have by dint of their own energies and industry made a most favorable comparison of their business enterprises with any other business interests in the country.

Mr. Chairman, before the era of railroad building in this country, which began about 1837, the only means of transportation was water and highways. During this period of time Congress, recognizing its constitutional power over the highways to a limited extent, did enter upon an era of improving them. One of the highways during this period of time which Congress sought to build and improve is what is known as the famous and historic old "Cumberland road." Starting at Cumberland, Md., it traveled west, traversing the State of Indiana, passing through the city of Indianapolis, the capital of that State. The last appropriation made for this purpose was made on the 25th of May, 1838, and the total expenditure by Congress for this road in Indiana was $1,136,600. A part of this road in the State of Indiana was turned over to the State in 1848, and it became a toll road for a portion of its length, until between 1890 and 1894, when it was purchased by the several townships in Indiana through which it passed and was made free.

The last half of the nineteenth century may well be considered the era of railroad building in the United States, and the result of American ingenuity and industry is evidenced to-day by about 250,000 miles of steam railroad in the United States, built at a cost of about $15,500,000,000, including equipment carrying 900,000,000 tons of freight and 700,000,000 passengers annually. This stupendous achievement was necessary in order that agricultural commerce, industrial development, and the enlightened progress of civilization might be adequate to meet the needs of a great people. This progress has served to practically annihilate the distance to distribute the products of each and every section throughout each and every other section; to make markets for the cotton of the South, the corn and wheat of the Middle West, the truct and small fruit of the Southeast, the dairy products of the Northwest, and the manufactures of the Northeast thousands of miles from the point of origin or production.

Mr. Chairman, to-day transportation is a vital factor in the agricultural industry, as much so as in any other industry, and it makes or mars the prosperity of the individual and of the locality. The first half of the twentieth century will in future years be known as the era of public-road building in America, just as the last half of the nineteenth century was and is known as the era of railroad building in the United States. The commerce of the country has reached such tremendous proportions that the cost of transportation represents a sum which staggers the imagination. The receipts of the railroads alone are about $1,800,000,000 per annum. From this it is apparent that the variations in rate of hauling of the smallest fraction of a cent means a difference of millions of dollars to the people.

The freight hauling on railroads began at 7½ cents per ton per mile about 1837, and this has been forced down until to-day it is about 7½ mills per ton per mile, or one-tenth of the original rate. This rate having been reached on railroads and ocean rates having been reduced to a point where it only costs 2.2 cents per bushel to haul wheat from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles, it is evident, therefore, that the only great opportunity which remains for cutting down the immense cost of hauling is through the improvement of public roads, which constitute the primary means of transportation for our agricultural products, for many millions of tons of forest products and mine and manufacturing products, and which for a large proportion of farmers constitute the only avenues of transportation from the point of production directly to the consumer. It costs the farmer on an average 23 cents per ton per mile to haul his produce from point of production to market. It costs on the railroad 7½ mills per ton per mile, and it costs one-tenth of a mill per ton per mile to haul the farmers' produce by water. It can be readily seen, therefore, why it costs the farmer three times as much to haul a bushel of wheat to market as it does to ship it across the Atlantic Ocean. This is hardly believable, yet it is an indisputable fact. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report of last year, says that the railroads of the country alone during that year hauled over their lines 265,000,000 tons of produce raised by the farmers of the country. This reduced to pounds means 5,300,000,000 pounds. Allowing 1 ton to the wagonload, it means 265,000,000 wagonloads of farmers' produce which had to be moved from the point of production to a market over public roads, with an average of 9.4 miles over the roads, making a total distance traveled of more than 3,000,000,000 miles to get their produce to market. This enormous drain for transportation over the highways of the country proves the assertion that our annual bill for hauling produce over the roads is more than $500,000,000 per year to be well established. These figures are astounding, especially when it is asserted upon the most reputable authority that it costs less than one-half as much per ton per mile to haul over the roads in England, France, and Germany as it does to haul over roads in the United States.

The justification of the era of good-road building is found in the determination on the part of the people to save $250,000,000 a year to the people, to say nothing of the tremendous impetus improved roads will give to education, to enhancement of land values, to the growth of country population, and to the extension of comfort, and happiness on the farm, and the maintenance of high standards of living and of citizenship. The railroads could not exist to-day were it not for the immense tonnage of farmers' commodities transported by them over their lines of railway, nor would there be such a popular clamor for large appropriations to improve the rivers and harbors, were it not for the fact that these great national arteries of commerce annually haul immense tonnage of the produce of farmers, distributing it to the great centers of population, and yet every pound of this freight hauled by either the railroads or the rivers must first be hauled by the farmer in wagons over highways, well-nigh impassable several months in a year, for a distance of more than 9 miles per haul. How can these improved conditions be brought about? Only by taxation in some form upon all the people and upon all the business of the country alike, and then by equally distributing the money collected through the avenues of taxation and equally distributing it through appropriations made by Congress to the States or to civil subdivision of States for the improvement of their highways. Where is the money to come from? Road improvement costs money, not a little, but volumes of it. To raise the money with which to improve the highways it is clear that it can not be done by assessing the community along the line of the highway or in the township or county where the road may be situated.

Mr. Chairman, the people in the rural districts are willing to pay their proportion of the cost of improving the highway, but when they have stood their part by way of taxation they find that they are unequal to the task, and that the burden is more than they can stand, and this class of people have for more than a century submitted to taxation for the purpose of improving the rivers and harbors of the country. Patriotically they have stood by and observed their money being appropriated for this purpose, realizing all the time that the appropriation of money for this purpose would not be so urgent were it not for the fact that their produce transported by them over well-nigh impassable roads for a large part of the year went to swell the enormous commerce of the rivers in the country. So the question of raising money for this purpose has passed on beyond a township, county, or state question, and is now a national issue.

The Democratic party in its last convention assembled at Denver openly declared in favor of government aid for the improvement of the public highways of the country. The farmers believe, and justly so, that a part of the money raised by taxes levied on the people of the entire country should be devoted to a purpose that is so imminently one relating to the national welfare as it is, that of improving our highways. They are convinced that of the enormous sum taken every year from the people by way of taxation levied for the most part on the consuming public, of which they form so large a part, the expenditure for their benefit is very small. And they know of no other way in which the unequal distribution of the public funds could be made fairer to the largest class of taxpayers, the farmers, than by making material appropriations in aid of better highways. The argument is made by some who are unfriendly to the propostiion that if Congress undertook to make appropriations for this purpose, that this would be an invasion of the rights of the States, because they argue that our roads are purely a matter of state concern. How can it be an invasion of the rights of the States to ask the Federal Government to aid in improving its own post-roads, the very roads which the Government claims under the Constitution the right to establish, and over which roads it claims the right to transport the mail? It can not in any legal sense be an invasion of the rights of the States for the Government to improve or aid in improving its own property, and by the Constitution it is expressly declared that the Government has the power to establish post-roads upon the highways. By others it is claimed that such a system of the Government in aiding the States in the improvement of their highways would be paternalism, socialism, and all other isms. Such epithets when applied to the real question at issue means nothing at all, it is no argument, and does not convince anyone either in favor of or against the proposition of government aid for the improvement of highways. If it be paternalism or socialism to aid the States in improving the post-roads of the country, then it is equally paternalism or socialism for the Government to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, because there is as much constitutional warrant for the one as there is for the other.

No sensible man would for a moment contend that it is either paternalism or socialism for the Government to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and no sensible man, if he will be honest with himself and with the public, will contend for one moment that it is either socialism or paternalism for the Government to appropriate money to aid the States in the improvement of the post-roads of the Government. Another objection frequently made against this policy is that federal aid would simply amount to taxing the people of the various States and returning the money to them in the way of appropriations for highway improvements. The truth is that the Federal Government is now steadily encroaching on the taxing sphere of the States without consideration of the purposes for which the money is to be expended, and for this reason alone the demand of the farmers for federal aid along this line is fully justified. In most of the States where the policy of state aid for the improvement of highways has been adopted, a considerable part of the state revenue are derived from taxes on corporations and inheritance taxes, and some of the States have enacted an income-tax law. It could be reasonably expected that the States which have yet to adopt this policy would rely on these taxes to a large extent for providing the necessary funds for road improvement.

Mr. Chairman, the last Congress enacted a law imposing a federal tax on corporations, and a federal inheritance tax law is strongly favored by the President of the United States, and will doubtless be enacted by Congress into a law in the not distant future. A constitutional amendment has been submitted to the States which, if adopted by the requisite number of the States, will give to Congress the power to pass an income-tax law, and it is therefore only fair that the States should say to Congress "since you insist on invading what is properly our sphere of taxation we insist that in expending the revenue derived from these taxes you must devote a portion of it to purposes that will benefit the greatest number of our people."

There will be those in and out of this House who will denounce this idea as paternalism and socialism, yet these same men will persuade their consciences that it is neither socialism nor paternalism to vote for a ship subsidy, which ultimately means a tax upon the consuming masses for the sole and exclusive benefit of a few shipowners in the country, and which will pile many millions of dollars in the way of burdens upon the mass of the people, with no corresponding benefit in return to them whatever. How any man can support a ship subsidy, designed only for the benefit of the few, and turn his back upon this proposition is beyond my comprehension, and if newspapers can be believed, the capital is now infested with a lot of professional lobbyists looking after their pet scheme, a ship subsidy. If the farmers of the country are to be taxed solely for the benefit of private industry and private monopoly in the way of a ship subsidy, I hope they will make it clear to their Representatives and Senators in the next Congress that Congress must make liberal appropriations for aiding the States in the improvement of the country's highways. The far-fetched argument has been advanced that the adoption of the policy of federal aid and a cooperation on the part of the Government with the States in improving the country's highways would tend to lessen the interest of the States themselves in the work of improving and building macadamized roads. In my humble judgement I believe this danger to be wholly imaginary, not real, and without any foundation whatever, because I believe that instead of federal aid to the States discouraging the States' activity along this line that federal aid would greatly stimulate and increase the activity of the States in the building of good roads. The claim that if the National Government were to make appropriations to assist the States in extending their improved road system that the people of the States would lose interest in the subject is based upon a mistaken view of human nature, particularly the farmer nature.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the direct effect of federal aid would be to create a still greater interest in this movement among the States and show more clearly than ever the erroneous influence that would be exerted by good roads in promoting our national prosperity, education, health, and social welfare. A question that directly concerns the interest of all the people of the entire country can no longer be regarded as merely a local issue, but a national one, in which not only the farmer, but the banker, the merchant, the railroad magnate, the laborer, and, in fact, every person living in this country is vitally interested. I have given this subject some thought and consideration in the past three years, and to this end I have secured a copy of the road laws of almost every State in the Union; and upon an examination and a comparison of these road laws I find that no two States have identically the same road laws. There seems to be as many diversified laws upon the highways as there are States themselves, and I believe it to be a hopeless task to get the States to adopt uniform road laws of and within themselves. Believing this to be impossible, and to obviate this very thing and to bring about uniformity of road laws among the States so as to give the Government power to aid them in the improvement of their highways, I have introduced the bill heretofore outlined by me. If the Government ever embarks upon this era of road building in the way of aiding the States, and I have no doubt but that it will—special interests can not put off the day of reckoning much longer—the Government itself must fix by law the terms and conditions upon which the States can share in the distribution of appropriations for this purpose. I would not raise the question of section against section, nor would I raise the question of occupation against occupation, but, as a class, the farmers have never received their share of legislation, and yet they have been a most potential factor in the building up of our great Republic. They have reached a point, in spite of themselves and in spite of objections and many difficulties which they have had to meet and overcome, where, from a commercial viewpoint, they are to-day occupying a most conspicuous place as financial factors in this country. Two years ago the bankers of the country brought on what was termed a "bankers' panic," but in a few months the farmers' crops soon drove it to the jungles, and I hope never to return again.

The value of the farmers' crops this year, according to the reports of the Secretary of Agriculture, reached the startling figure of $9,000,000,000, furnishing food to 90,000,000 of people in this country, with a surplus to send abroad large enough to make the balance of the world's trade in our favor of more than $400,000,000. His crops this year almost equal two-thirds of the total value of all the railroads in the United States, including equipment, and is at least three-fourths of the value of all the lines of railway in this country, without equipment, although it has taken three score and ten years to build up our railway system in this country; and the Government has aided in the building up of our great railway system by giving it land equal in size and area to the Republic of France or the Empire of Germany. If in the course of three score and ten years, by an investment of $15,000,000,000, private capital can build 250,000 miles of steam railroad, certainly in the same period of time, or less, the Government, working in connection with the States, can surely build a system of highways in this country which will equal in splendor and glory the highways of ancient Rome, which to-day stand as a monument of that one-time great and flourishing empire. The Governments of France, Germany, England, and other European countries, long ago, recognizing the necessity of work of this kind, entered upon eras of national road building, and along this line they have left our Government far in the rear, although we are undoubtedly the richest Government upon the earth. The total assessed valuation of property in the United States is now approximately $120,000,000,000, almost two and one-half times of either the Governments of England, France, or Germany, these three Governments being to-day the leading powers of Europe, and one-half of this assessed wealth in our country is owned by farmers, represented by farm values and farm products.

The population of our country is approximately 90,000,000 of people, and this represents a total population of almost twice as many as either of the above-named governments, and one-half of this population in our country are farmers or people living in rural communities, and yet we are told that it is all right to vote a tax upon him for the purpose of a ship subsidy, but if he asks in return some aid to not only improve his own condition but to equally improve the condition of all other people, no matter whether they live in towns or in cities, he is answered in his request by being told that this is socialism or paternalism. My answer to these charges is that if it be either or both let us make the most of it. While I am in favor of maintaining a moderate navy and army, I am unalterably opposed to maintaining an immense navy or large standing army, both of which make a constant drain on our resources to maintain them, and I believe that instead of appropriating $139,000,000, as we did last year to maintain our navy, and more than $100,000,000 to maintain our army, for one I would much prefer seeing these appropriations cut down and a part of this money put into the improvement of our country's highways. This would aid in building up our country and would in a short period of time, in a true sense, make us the greatest nation on the earth. Were such a course as this adopted, all benefits would not alone accrue to the man living in the country, but a corresponding benefit would be given to the man living in the city or town. The cost of transportation of any article to the ultimate consumer must always be taken into account, and if the cost of transportation of the farmers' commodities can be reduced, the consumers of these commodities in towns and cities would receive a corresponding benefit to them in the way of having reduced the cost of necessities of life.

It is estimated that a tax of $12.50 per capita is placed upon every man, woman, and child in the country as a result of bad roads. This result of bad roads constitute yearly tolls of $12.50 per capita against everyone who eats and consumes farm produce. This yearly waste would build 200,000 miles of macadamized road every year, basing the average cost per mile of road at $5,000. We have 2,000,000 miles of public highways in the country, and by saving this yearly waste, and turning it to an improvement of the highways, in ten years we could improve all the great thoroughfares of the country. Our Government can not afford to take any backward step along this line.

Mr. Chairman, it must keep abreast, if not ahead, of the nations of Europe, which long ago began the improvement of public highways by making national appropriations for this purpose. If the Governments of England, France, Germany, and other European countries can do this and do it successfully, why can not our Government do the same thing? It can, and it can do it much more easily than any European government because of our superior national wealth, and superior population, upon which to draw as a national resource from which to procure the revenue for this purpose. Let no one be deterred that such a course will be an interference with state rights. Let no one falter, believing that such a policy would lessen the ardor of the States in the building of good roads if the Government comes to the aid of the States along this line. Let no one be afraid of being called a Socialist or Paternalist if he stands for such a course, but let everyone who believes in exact and even-handed justice between man and man plant himself upon the Constitution and declare that equal and exact justice shall be dealt out to all the people. Undismayed by special interests for myself, whether in or out of Congress, I propose to stand for this policy, believing that by so doing I am following out the maxim upon which all republican forms of government rest, that of equal opportunity before the law. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I hope the other side will occupy some time now.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, for some time prior to the date of the President's message there has been an agitation of a proposition by leading negroes that it would be fitting, as well as a benefit to the people, that there should be a great national exposition showing the progress made by the negro race, not only during the period of their freedom, but also from the time of their coming to this country.

The year 1913 will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation proclamation granting freedom for the negro, and for the first time putting him on a basis where he must go into the world and be self-sustaining and self-supporting. A great exposition showing the tremendous strides this race has made in fifty years, both in agricultural, industrial, commercial, business, and professional life, would be of great benefit and of tremendous educational value, not only to the negro, but to the white race, throughout this great country.

I am glad to say that this movement has not only met with the approval of the prominent negroes, but has been encouraged and will continue to be encouraged by prominent white people and the press. Men of the South are as much interested in an exposition of this kind and have shown as much, if not more, encouragement toward the project as any other section of the country. President Taft in his message calls attention to this movement and the proposed exposition, and suggests that a preliminary commission be authorized by Congress of not more than seven persons to consider carefully whether or not it is wise to hold such an exposition; and if so, to outline a plan for the enterprise. His recommendation carries a preliminary commission without salary, except as to their actual expenses, and he advises that an appropriation be made for this purpose only.

I have always been interested in the progress of the negro race, and immediately after the message was read in Congress I prepared a joint resolution, which was submitted to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, and provided, in substance:

That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint a commission consisting of seven persons to consider carefully whether or not it is advisable to hold an exposition in the year 1913 to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation proclamation granting freedom to the negroes, and that the said commission report to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1910.

This resolution further provides for an appropriation of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of which shall be paid the necessary expenses and disbursements of the commission, all of which shall be provided by the Secretary of the Treasury on vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission.

This resolution is now pending before the committee to which it was referred, and I hope and believe that it will be favorably reported and passed by both the House and Senate of the United States. I am also gratified that the Hon. WILLIAM RODENBERG, of Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, has introduced a like resolution, and has shown great interest in, and approval of the subject.

What more valuable purpose could be served than to teach the world of the progress of the negro in his fifty years of freedom in an educational, moral, and religious direction? To be a success, it must not be left to the negro people alone, but should be a matter in which the whole American people, white and colored, should take an active interest.

There have been many expositions held during recent years, and there may be a feeling that there have been too many; but an exposition of this kind, which serves such a laudable purpose, should be encouraged, particularly when it will teach the world a lesson, showing how it is possible for two races to live together in peace and helpfulness. No place in the world do so many white and colored people live together with so little friction as in the United States. In no place in the world has the negro advanced further in industrial, educational, and moral direction than has the negro in the United States. The causes for these advancements, the results of their efforts, placed under intelligent scrutiny, must result in benefit to all the people of the United States, as well as to the world.

It is of the greatest importance to the Nation that the negro should be uplifted in every possible way; that his right to self-improvement should be recognized; that he should be encouraged in citizenship; and if an exposition of this kind will help the negro, such an exposition should by all means be held. I do not speak from sentiment. I look upon this as a great economic question; one to be taken hold of seriously and soberly and worked out with the utmost care. For that reason, I approve of a commission of prominent men, first to determine its advisability and, second, to lay out a plan for its consummation. It seems to me that the first question before the commission is, Will such an exposition benefit the colored race? If this commission determines that it will, there can be no valid objection from any section of this country to such an exposition. A careful investigation of the results of the negro's progress brings forth some startling figures. When you think that the education of the negro practically began with the emancipation proclamation, and that the illiteracy of the whole race may be admitted to have been almost total at emancipation, it is a mark of splendid progress to know that at the time the last census was taken it had been reduced to 44.5 per cent. It is undoubtedly much lower at the present time, as is shown by the fact that from 1890 to 1900 it had been reduced from 57.1 per cent to 44.5 per cent. In my State of Ohio, where the negro is educated and gladly takes advantage of the opportunities for an education, only 17.9 per cent were illiterate at the time of the last census. There are white countries with centuries of civilization behind them which can not show any such advancement. I am told that there are 40,000 negro students in colleges, studying all branches from trade to scientific and classical courses. More than 40,000 have graduated from the various secondary institutions; more than 40,000 from colleges. There are 3,000 teachers, 16,000 clergymen, 4,000 musicians, 17,000 physicians and surgeons, 1,000 lawyers, 300 journalists, 236 artists, 82 bankers and brokers, and 52 architects. The race owned in 1904 property amounting to $1,100,000,000. It operates 476,718 farms, and owns 187,797 farms.

This is not a bad showing for a race which has had but fifty years of freedom, and what a splendid opportunity would be given by an exposition of this kind to show the results of all this effort in a way that the people of the country will have an opportunity for personal inspection. What better way to encourage them to further effort along the lines of good citizenship? In 1900 the negroes owned farm property valued at $200,000,000, almost $300 for each negro family. The auditor of the State of Virginia, in his report of 1904, says that the negro increased the value of his property in one year $1,054,626, making a value in that year of their total property of $19,554,844.

We have recognized that the real backbone of our country is agriculture. The negro has recognized this fact. More than 2,000,000 are engaged in agricultural pursuits.

The negro has not forgotten that religion is a necessary adjunct to good citizenship, and they have 200,000 churches, valued at many millions of dollars. I believe that the people of the North, as well as the South, should interest themselves in this great work. A commission should be appointed of able and prominent men, the matter should be fully investigated, and I firmly believe that, after a full investigation, there will be a recommendation for an exposition which will be of incalculable benefit to the colored and the white people of this country. This exposition would tell a story of great human interest. It would be the only one of its kind, and would therefore be, by its novelty and by its laudable purpose, the center of attention of all thinking people of this country. It would give encouragement to the negroes of the better class, it would stir in the breasts of the whites a spirit of rejoicing in a success to which they have loaned their efforts. It appeals to progress; it appeals to prosperity. It would appeal to any man who has the best interests of the country at heart, who believes in progress, prosperity, and posterity.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield thirty minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS].

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we have submitted this year we believe is along the lines of the bills of the past, and we have given to the department all that they asked for and a little more. I do not propose to go into a summary of the provisions of the bill, because I assume that our worthy chairman will take up the bill and review it from start to finish.

The particular part that I wish to call attention to relates to our live-stock interests, and is more or less directly connected with the present crusade against high prices. I have collected here considerable information that I believe will be of interest to those who are willing to take the trouble to look this matter up.

You remember that it was with considerable difficulty that the inspection bill was passed, and sometimes we have failed to realize that the condemnation of a large number of cattle annually has something to do with the scarcity and the high prices, and I will submit a few figures showing the rejections on account of disease for the several years 1907, 1908, and 1909.

In 1907, of a total of 50,935,216 cattle that were inspected, 149,792 were rejected in whole. The parts of carcasses that were rejected amounted to 529,876. While that is not such a tremendous percentage of the total number of cattle slaughtered, it still has a bearing on the price of cattle.

The next year, out of 53,973,337 inspected, 175,126 carcasses were rejected in whole and 704,666 in part.

In 1909, up to June 30, the total number inspected was 55,672,075, of which 141,057 were rejected in whole and 899,628 in part.

Now, you will notice that last year there were 175,000 rejected whole carcasses, whereas this year, ending June 30, 1909, there were only 141,057. That is encouraging from the point of view of those who believe that the inspection law ultimately will result in a more healthful condition of the cattle of this country. Of the animals inspected, the largest number of those condemned were swine and the smallest number goats, showing that by far the most healthy of any of the animals slaughtered were goats.

The report of the Bureau of Animal Industry shows that by far the greatest number of animals condemned were suffering from tuberculosis, and that is true of both cattle and swine. In 1907 the number of carcasses of cattle condemned for this disease was 19,305, and parts of carcasses 10,530, out of a total of 7,621,717 inspected; for hogs, whole carcasses, 65,618, and parts of carcasses, 364,559, out of a total of 31,815,900 inspected. In 1908 the cattle inspected fell to 7,116,275 and the condemnations for tuberculosis rose to 24,371 in whole and 27,446 in part; but we find that in 1908 the number of swine inspected increased by 5,000,000 and the number of condemnations increased to 77,584 in whole and 628,462 in part. Then in 1909 there were 7,325,337 cattle inspected, out of which number 24,525 were condemned in whole and 40,148 in part; the number of swine inspected in that year was 35,427,931, of which 45,113 were condemned in whole and 791,735 in part for this disease. I have given the figures for tuberculosis only, because that was by far the most prevalent disease; in fact, it was by far more prevalent than all the others combined.

The next thing of particular importance, perhaps, in connection with the Bureau of Animal Industry is as to whether our vast expenditures for the benefit of the cattle industry in the Southern States has been of any value. I will read an extract from the Daily Live Stock Report of January 1, 1910, which has a direct bearing on that work of the bureau:

NEW TERRITORY ADDED.

With the lifting of the quarantine against a good many counties in Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and the Panhandle, the native cattle market has profited by the additional receipts from the States mentioned. The lifting of the quarantine has stimulated interest of the cattlemen there in the business, and production will undoubtedly be pushed along more vigorous lines.

The stockmen of southern Missouri are giving more time and attention to the raising and breeding of better cattle than in former years. This has been especially observed during the past year. That territory is rapidly coming to the front as a producing center, and to-day is considered one of the substantial sources of supply.

This refers particularly to the market at St. Louis. I would like to call the attention of the House to this, because sometimes we are asked, Are the activities of the Agricultural Department resulting in any real good to the people of the country and the farmers?

The next particular question that comes up in the consideration of the price of beef is whether the farmer is getting his due proportion of increase in the price of cattle.

Mr. WEISSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKS of New York. I will yield for a question.

Mr. WEISSE. Does the Agricultural Department keep any account of what they do with the meat that is condemned after inspection?

Mr. COCKS of New York. The ones that are condemned go to the tank and are reduced for fertilizer.

Mr. WEISSE. Are not a great many of them consumed under certain conditions?

Mr. COCKS of New York. We believe not, and that is so stated by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and we have no reason to believe that his statement is incorrect.

Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that if many of these cattle had been slaughtered by the country butchers they would have been consumed.

Mr. WEISSE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever knew of the country butcher killing or carrying on the slaughter business in the insanitary conditions that the great packers were reported to be carrying it on in a report made by the administration at one time?

Mr. COCKS of New York. I believe that the average butcher was no more careful than the packers were, judging from the butcher shops and slaughterhouses that I was familiar with.

Mr. WEISSE. That is not the question. I asked the gentleman if the average condition in the packing houses was not more insanitary and in a worse condition than the butchers' slaughterhouses when this report was made?

Mr. COCKS of New York. We have no report of the sanitary conditions of the local butchers as compared with that of the packers, and I can only state what I do from my own observation.

Mr. WEISSE. My observation has been that the report made of the packing industry by St. Clair and the butchering industry by the local butchers in my State, where I have visited them, that the local butchers were far ahead of the packing houses.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to make a speech I will help him to get time, but I have a few things I wish to submit myself. Now, in taking up this matter of high prices, I came across an old report made by Senator Vest in 1888, when conditions were the reverse of now, and when the great cry was that the producers of the country were not getting sufficient money for their cattle, and I am just going to read a little statement published in the Farmers and Drovers Journal, of Chicago, of January 1, 1910, to show what the condition of the Chicago market was at that time.

I want to give you an idea of the amount of business done, and of course you realize that the prices received at the Chicago market were what the farmer received, less the freight and the commission. I herewith submit two items printed in the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal for January 1, 1910:

Valuation of 1909 live stock marketings at stock yards, $316,754,000, against $307,680,000 in 1908.

Cattle valuation for year, $165,545,000; calves, $4,858,000; hogs, $107,007,000; sheep, $24,414,000; horses, $14,930,000.

Combined receipts of all classes show decrease of 1,544,997 from previous year.

Highest average prices on record established for native beef cattle, western range cattle and lambs, and also in lamb trade.

Average price for hogs, at $7.35; highest since 1882. Top hogs, at $8.75, in year highest since 1893.

Packers' predictions of cheaper hogs in November and December go wide of mark when supplies fall far below normal volume.

New record price of $9.90 is hung up for Colorado lambs.

Champion Percheron stallion Carnot sells in Chicago at record price of $10,000 during international show week.

Horse sale industry again rides top wave of prosperity.

Average price for steers in year, $6.35; highest on record.

Year's open market top price, $9.50; highest since June, 1870. Record price made May 29, 1867, at $10.25.

Native cattle receipts for the year 2,527,907, against 2,662,006 in 1908.

High corn price throughout the year was worry to feeders; however, feeding operations were profitable.

Quality shows no improvement for year. High feed cost cuts short the supplies of finished beeves.

Summer pastures excellent and grass-fed marketings were heavy in fall months.

Cattle valuation was $165,545,000, against $164,190,000 in 1908, showing an increase in spite of a drop in receipts.

Eastern shippers liberal competitors in all seasons, but total shipments show decrease from former year.

International show steer prices highest on record, making an average of $11.44 for 52 loads.

Steers averaged highest in September, at $6.75. Low month was February, when average was $5.95.

From August to December prime beeves topped at $8 to $9.50, while in last three months tops ranged above $9.

Choice beeves were lowest sale in February and April, when tops made $7.15.

Short-fed steers in fall made highest prices in years. Forty to sixty day fed steers sold up to $7.50.

Yearling steers popular with slaughterers and sell at high rates.

Hide market high throughout the year; closes 1 to 3¼ cents up from year ago.

One feature of the first of the items that I have just read I wish particularly to call to your attention, namely, that the horse industry again rides on the top wave of prosperity. I have never heard anyone charge that the horse market was controlled by a trust or a combination of any sort, and yet, notwithstanding the great increase in the number of automobiles, horses bring the highest prices they have ever brought in this country since we have been on a gold standard. It seems to me that this conclusively proves that in one of the farm products at least we have a good price without there being any charge of its being due to combinations of any kind.

I desire also to call your attention to the fact that the difference between the average monthly receipts in 1901 and 1909 at the Chicago stock yards was 9,000 per month. In the same period there was a decrease of 137,000 hogs per month and an increase of 34,000 sheep per month. The Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal for December 30, 1909, states that in the six principal markets, namely, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Louis, St. Joseph, and Sioux City, the increase in receipts in 1909 over 1908 of cattle was 298,000 and sheep 267,000, but that there was a decrease in hogs of 3,642,000.

As a further evidence that the farmer is receiving better prices for his stock than ever before, I desire to call your attention to an extract from the Daily National Live Stock Reporter for January 1, 1910, which is a general review of the market for the year; also, I wish to call your attention to a statement issued by the East St. Louis National Stock Yards to the farmers. I herewith submit both articles:

THE TOP-NOTCH PRICES, REFERRING TO THE ST. LOUIS MARKETS.

The high price of the year for straight market beeves was $8.75, paid during the week of October 23 for a load weighing 1,551 pounds. The top price of yearling steers less than a thousand pounds was $8.35 the week ending October 2, they averaging 928 pounds. Yearlings over a thousand pounds brought $8.50 on September 21.

All records in the history of the market were broken when on Tuesday, December 14, 17 steers, averaging 1,245 pounds, sold for $10.50 straight. They were Christmas cattle, thoroughly finished, and fit for the show ring.

With the regular market basis at a high level the sale of Christmas cattle was looked upon with considerable uncertainty. During former years transactions of the holiday beef were hardly as high, as a rule, as the choice market cattle sold during many weeks of the year. As a result, sellers had little idea what was forthcoming.

While the price level throughout the past year has been satisfactory, its effect upon future feeding is yet to be determined. Whether 50 to 60 cent corn and $33 cotton-seed meal and cake will curtail feeding is to be seen. However, from the opinions expressed by various feeders, it seems that there is not enough margin between cost and selling values to stimulate extensive feeding at the prices.

THE EAST ST. LOUIS NATIONAL STOCK YARDS—A WORD OF ADVICE TO THE FARMERS.

The high prices paid for all classes of live stock during the past year justify the farmer in increasing his production. The country is crying aloud for greater meat supplies. They are pleading to you through high prices. Think of it: Hogs close to the 9-cent mark, cattle up to $10.50 per 100, sheep and lambs on the highest basis known for some time at this season of the year. These prices certainly justify a very liberal increase in production and feeding.

Don't be afraid of overdoing it. The facts are, while the population of the country has been on the increase by leaps and bounds, the production of live stock has been practically at a standstill. In fact, in some localities it has actually decreased. The western ranges are fast disappearing. It will be years before the farmer settlers throughout the West can reproduce the stock of which the settling up of the range is depriving the markets.

I just cite these figures to show that at least the farmer was getting a portion, and as to whether he was getting a just portion of the high prices it must be left to your individual judgment to decide. In my own judgment he was getting as fair a share of the retail price as he ever got.

Now, referring to the report of which I spoke a few moments ago, in 1888, when the Senate appointed a committee to investigate because cattle were selling so low, they then believed that the trouble all lay with the packer, that he was absorbing the profit. I want to read the conclusion of that report, to show how the conditions as then seen by the committee have been verified:

CONCLUSION.

If the cattle raisers of the United States are only true to themselves the immediate future promises deliverance from present evils. There is no excuse for panic.

The worst feature of the cattle trade is the fact that so many cows and calves are being thrown upon the market, the indication being that producers are panic-stricken and anxious to realize now without regard to the future. There were marketed at Chicago during the past year 3,023,281 cattle, of which from 25 to 30 per cent were cows and 4 per cent were calves.

A little reflection will satisfy every intelligent man that no combination can keep the prices of beef cattle at present quotations. The population of the country is increasing in a wonderful ratio, and of course the increase is greater each year. The foreign demand for American beef is annually growing, and it can be only a short time until our store cattle will be admitted into the United Kingdom. The British cattle raisers are earnestly demanding the removal of all restrictions upon the importation of such cattle, and if our authorities earnestly address themselves to the task the difficulty can be removed.

Besides, the cattle-growing region in the West is being rapidly limited. The admission of new States, and the settlement of agricultural lands, the quantity of which is enlarged by systematic irrigation, must necessarily decrease the grazing area. While this is so, there will be an increased demand for beef with increased population, and enlarged facilities for the preparation of beef and its transportation to new markets.

It is impossible that the Chicago market should continue to control the cattle interest of the whole country as it does now, or that a few large operators shall retain their hold upon that market.

This is a new country, not yet out of its first national manhood, and rapid development, with phenomenal transition from one commercial condition to another, must attend our future. The center of population is moving westward, and the centers of trade must change with changing population.

As lines of railroad penetrate the continent and new territory is opened to commerce and production, the distributing centers must, of course, be affected, and so it will continue to be until our country has reached the last stage of national development and danger—that in which the soil is sustaining human life to its fullest capacity.

The cattle raisers of the United States should be and are the most competent judges as to their own interest, but if they will accept a suggestion from those whose duty it has been for months to examine the cattle question in all its aspects, they will cease marketing their breeding and immature stock, and diligently prepare for a larger supply and a brighter future.

It is only a question of time, and very brief time, when the problem will be that of supplying our own people with beef without regard to foreign markets.

Under present conditions, and until we escape from the abnormal and ruinous centralization of the cattle market and its domination by a few men and railroad corporations, every effort should be made by deep-water improvement on the Gulf of Mexico, diplomatic endeavor to remove quarantine regulations in Great Britain, national inspection, and the prohibition of monopoly in steamship transportation, to enlarge our foreign market; but eventually it will require all the cattle produced in this country to supply the home demand.

Respectfully submitted.

Showing that even twenty years ago they foresaw that the then low price of cattle could not last, and to-day their prediction has been more than verified. Now, in that same report there was printed a table showing the proportion of cattle to the population since 1850. We find that in 1850 there were 491 cattle to the thousand population, and it ran along then about the same until 1889, when we find that there 523 for 1,000 population. The next figures available that I have are for 1900, when there were only 363 per thousand population. In 1901 they rose to 588; 1902, 566; and running along down to the banner year 1907, when there were 600 cattle to 1,000 population. In 1910 it is again down to 531 per 1,000 of our population. That holds very much the same with the milch cows.

I find that in 1850 the number of milch cows was 275 per thousand of population, and that the number greatly decreased for each census period until in 1889 there were 235 per thousand, and in 1900, 213 per thousand. It is estimated that there are 245 per thousand in 1910, this year, considerably less than the proportion per thousand in 1850.

I submit herewith a few figures compiled by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture which would indicate that they think some of the high prices have inured to the benefit of the farmer, because while they not only give the figures of the increase in farm stock, they also show a large increase in valuation, and as this stock is still in the hands of the farmer they must have been of the opinion that he would get some benefit from the high prices:

Compared with January 1, 1909, the following changes are indicated: Horses have increased 400,000, mules increased 70,000, milch cows increased 81,000, other cattle decreased 2,100,000, sheep increased 1,132,000, swine decreased 6,365,000.

In average value per head, horses increased $12.55, mules increased $12, milch cows increased $3.43, other cattle increased $1.92, sheep increased $0.65, swine increased $2.59.

In total value, horses increased $302,311,000, mules increased $57,013,000, milch cows increased $77,363,000, other cattle increased $53,699,000, sheep increased $41,032,000, swine increased $81,809,000.

The total value of all animals enumerated above on January 1, 1910, was $5,138,486,000, as compared with $4,525,259,000 on January 1, 1909, an increase of $613,227,000, or 13.6 per cent.

The details by States will be published in the February number of the Crop Reporter.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COCKS of New York. Why can not the gentleman wait until I am through and then bunch all of the questions at once?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Right there on that line I want to ask for information; if the gentleman has the figures showing the prices of beef and beef cattle during those years?

Mr. COCKS of New York. No; I have not got that. I did not get the run of prices for those particular years. I have got the price here for February 11, 1889, when the price for a 525-pound carcass was 3¾ cents per pound at Kansas City.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to know what relation the number of cattle per thousand of population bore to the price.

Mr. COCKS of New York. It will require considerable figuring to carry that out all the way down the line. I submit this more to show that the proportion has hardly kept pace with the population, and we assume—most economists do—that we are eating more per capita of beef than we ever did before.

Mr. MOSS. Is it not a fact that in this report that Secretary Wilson has just submitted and put out to the country he states that we have been for the last fifty years constantly eating less meat per capita?

Mr. COCKS of New York. I did not notice that statement in the report, and I did not suppose that that was true. I would be very glad if the gentleman would look it up. I am only judging from my own information. I believe that we certainly are eating a higher class of meat.

Mr. MOSS. I would like to say to the gentleman that the Secretary of Agriculture estimates along the line that, supposing we were eating 100 thirty years ago, we are eating now only 60.

Mr. COCKS of New York. I would be glad to see that.

Mr. MOSS. The gentleman will find it in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Now, to show you the tremendous difference in the prices of the carcass in different years, I will cite from an exhibit in this same report, submitted by the individual butchers in Kansas City. At that time they give the price of a thousand-pound steer at 3¾ cents. To-day that same carcass is worth 8 cents in Washington. They submitted at that time what they considered the cost of killing this thousand-pound steer, and I will put that table in the RECORD. It is as follows:

EXHIBIT A.

KANSAS CITY, MO., February 11, 1889.

DEAR SIR: As butchers of Kansas City, in the retail business, we desire to submit the following statement of the profits in our business:

Cost of a 525-pound carcass, beef, at 3¾ cents		$19.68
Cost of handling same, 14 per cent		2.75
Waste, which is a total loss in cutting, one-tenth		1.96
Total cost to retailer (proprietor's time excepted)		24.39
Proceeds of 525-pound carcass:
90 pounds loin, at 12½ cents	$11.25
80 pounds round { 52 pounds, at 8½ cents	4.20
{ 28 pounds, at 2 cents	.56
26 pounds rump, at 5 cents	1.30
40 pounds rib, at 8 cents	3.20
90 pounds chuck, at 5 cents	4.50
80 pounds plate, at 2½ cents	2.00
60 pounds foreshoulder and shank, at 3½ cents	2.10
36 pounds neck, at 2 cents	.72
20 pounds tallow, at 1½ cents	.30
Leaving a profit to the retail butcher upon which to live of		5.74

This, Mr. Senator, is the amount upon which the retail butcher of this city must sustain his losses from poor credits and support his family.

We wish to submit, in addition, what we think the packers make in this meat business:

1,000-pound bullock on foot, at 1¾ cents		$17.50
Cost of handling (per Armour's statement, 50 cents) ours		1.00
Total cost		18.50
Proceeds:
525 pounds dressed beef, at 3¾ cents	$19.68
Hide (Armour's statement)	4.00
Offal (Armour's statement)	1.90
		25.58
Net profit to packer		7.08

This, Mr. Senator, is a fair statement of the meat business.

A. W. CHURCH & Co.
JOHN JACOBS.
JOHN STADLER.

Hon. Senator G. G. VEST.

I just put that in to show you. Now, there is another interesting fact to note. In the same report I find some figures on the hide question to which I desire to call your attention. In 1879 hides were selling for 9 cents, in 1880 for 11 cents, in 1881 for 12 cents, running down from that price to 9 cents again in 1889, but making at no time a variation of over 1¾ cents a pound.

I notice from the statistics of the Department of Agriculture that in 1896 hides were selling at 8 cents, and they have greatly risen in price from that time to the present, when they are selling for 17 cents. I am citing this to show that notwithstanding the fact that the tariff has been removed from hides the price has not decreased. While I do not care to go into any argument on this question, in my judgment it is due to the increased demand for manufactured leather and the fact that our tanners have bid up the price in foreign markets, because we can tan hides here better than they can in any other country.

Mr. WEISSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKS of New York. I would like to bunch all of these questions.

Mr. WEISSE. Just a question——

Mr. COCKS of New York. I would like to bunch all of the questions at once.

Mr. WEISSE. It is only about ten words.

Mr. COCKS of New York. But I would like to get through and then answer questions.

Mr. WEISSE. It is just in line with what the gentleman said.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKS of New York. I will yield.

Mr. WEISSE. In 1893, according to the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, hogs sold for $6.60. Now, in 1905 they sold for $4.80. Was it the Dingley tariff that made that price?

Mr. COCKS of New York. I am not discussing the tariff bill, but a different proposition. I was asked about the price of hogs. The price of hogs in some of these years was very largely affected by an epidemic of hog cholera. I do not imagine that the Dingley law had anything particularly to do with hog cholera. Now, in this 1,000-pound steer—I am just calling attention to a few items—there are only 90 pounds of high-priced cuts in the 1,000-pound steer. It dresses at 525 pounds. That is about the average for steers all the way along, so that when we condemn the price and consider we are paying 25 or 30 cents a pound for meat, we must remember that out of the 1,000-pound steer we only get about 90 to 100 pounds of high-priced meat. I am aware that many statistics may be made misleading. It depends a good deal upon where you pick the figures. I have a little table here that will show that.

THE HOG MARKET.

[Extract from the Daily National Live Stock Reporter (East St. Louis), Monday, January 3, 1910.]

The following shows the receipts of hogs this week compared with the same week a year ago:

	This week.	A year ago.
Tuesday, December 28	5,939	10,391
Wednesday, December 29	4,302	11,682
Thursday, December 30	8,303	9,870
Friday, December 31	5,943	7,312
Saturday, January 1	3,573	4,538
Monday, January 3	9,818	11,894

Now, if I wanted to show you that the hog receipts had greatly fallen off, all I would have to cite is this: Tuesday, December 28, receipts were 5,939, and a year ago they had 10,391 on that market. The next day would be still worse from that point of view, because it is 4,000, as against 11,000 a year ago, but when we come to Monday, January 3, we find it comes nearly to being the same amount. In fact, we had 9,000, as against 11,000 a year ago, so there is only a difference of 2,000. That only evidences that in case we were particularly trying to make a point we could pick the best figures to illustrate our point. Now, speaking about the condition of the home market, the same paper says:

Shippers and butchers were anxious for good hogs, and forced the advance, while the packers were slow bidders, as they were opposed to paying any higher prices, but in order to get the hogs they had to pay more than they did at the close of the week. Some few hogs showed a greater advance than a dime, but not many. The top of the hogs was $8.60 for a load of good medium-weight hogs that averaged 238 pounds, while the bulk of the desirable hogs sold at $8.30 to $8.50, but the packers bought quite a lot of light-weight mixed hogs at $8 to $8.25. Packers bought a poorer grade of hogs than usual, and did not want to pay the higher price the better hogs were bringing. The hogs at $8.50 and above all went to the shippers and butchers, and they would have purchased a great many more at the same price had the hogs been on the market.

Shippers were particular as to the grade of hogs they purchased, as all that were not strictly good were left alone.

I also desire to call your attention to an extract from the report of James R. Garfield, the Commissioner of Corporations, on the beef industry, in 1905, which is as follows:

There is a wide difference among sections and among cities in regard to the proportion of the beef consumption which is furnished by the western packing companies. The six large western packers furnish a very great proportion of the beef consumed in most of the large cities east of Pittsburg. In New York they furnish about 75 per cent, in Boston more than 85 per cent, in Philadelphia about 60 per cent, in Pittsburg more than 60 per cent, in Providence more than 95 per cent, in Baltimore about 50 per cent, and a number of other important cities of this section receive from 50 to 90 per cent of their beef supply from the same source. On the other hand, Buffalo and cities west of Pittsburg, such as Cleveland, Cincinnati, and Indianapolis, receive only from 10 to 33⅓ per cent of their beef supply from these six companies.

In a large majority of the smaller cities and towns of New England the six companies furnish upward of three-fourths of the consumption, but in most places of less than 50,000 population in other Northern States their proportion is less than one-half, and in many cases less than one-fourth.

In the Southern States the large packers supply usually less than half of the beef consumed in the larger cities. There are notable exceptions, where the western packers supply proportions ranging from 50 per cent in Nashville, Tenn., to 90 per cent in Norfolk, Va. In the smaller cities and towns of this section the proportion falling to the western packers is usually less than one-fourth.

That part of the beef supply not furnished by the six leading western packing companies is almost wholly slaughtered by local concerns. The ability of such concerns to compete depends partly on their efficiency in operation and in the utilization of by-products and partly on the source from which they derive their cattle. In most of the larger cities there are important establishments slaughtering from 10,000 to 40,000 cattle per year, which, while less efficient than the great western houses, are probably not at a great disadvantage in this respect.

In all of the Northeastern States, except New England, there is an extensive dairy industry, which furnishes a large number of surplus cattle for slaughter; in parts of this section, moreover, considerable numbers of cattle are raised primarily for beef. A considerable proportion of the cattle locally slaughtered in most cities, therefore, is obtained from a moderate distance, giving the local concern a marked advantage over the western packer in respect to transportation.

Now, I think that I have spoken sufficiently of these figures to show you that the farmer is getting a certain proportion of the increased prices, and I only wish that he were getting a larger percentage of the increase of prices, but I believe that those things will have to be regulated by economic conditions, by the law of supply and demand, and I do not believe that anything that we can do here will change it one bit. When I hear of a boycott of meat, it seems to me that those who are instigating that fail to realize that thousands of hard workers throughout the country are engaged in the production of meat, and they should stop and think for a moment of the long hours these producers work; they should stop and think of the many years in the past, when farmers raised these products and sold them for less than it cost to raise them. People ask, If he sold the stuff for a price less than it cost him, how did he live? He lived on the accumulation of his ancestors, on his own accumulation, by putting a mortgage on the farm, and only too often in those years that was the case.

I herewith submit for your consideration certain interesting figures taken from Bulletin 81, of the Bureau of Labor, Department of Commerce and Labor, issued in March, 1909. These figures are very interesting to those who desire to study the trend of prices during the last few years:

BULLETIN OF THE BUREAU OF LABOR OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

[No. 81—March, 1909.]

Table II of the above bulletin gives the monthly actual and relative wholesale prices of commodities in 1908 and base prices (average for 1890–1899). Referring to said table, one finds that the average wholesale price per 100 pounds on steers, choice to extra, for 1890–1899, was $5.32, while the average for 1908 was $6.81, an increase of 28.1 per cent; also, the increase on steers, good to choice, per 100 pounds, in the same period, was 26.7 per cent.

The average wholesale price per bushel of corn for 1890–1899 was 38 cents, while the average in 1908 was 68 cents, an increase of 79 per cent.

The average wholesale price per pound on hides, green, salted, packers', heavy native steers, for 1890–1899, was 9 cents, while the average for 1908 was 13 cents, an increase of 42 per cent.

The average wholesale price on hogs for 1890–1899 was $4.41 per 100 pounds, while the average for 1908 was $5.79, an increase of 31 per cent.

The average wholesale price per bushel for oats, 1890–1899, was 26 cents, and the average for 1908 was 50 cents, an increase of 89 per cent.

The average wholesale price per bushel for beans was $1.66 for 1890–1899 and $2.31 for 1908, an increase of 38 per cent.

The average wholesale price per pound for cheese, New York full cream, was 9 cents for 1890–1899 and 13 cents for 1908, an increase of 38 per cent.

The average wholesale price per dozen for eggs, new-laid, fancy, nearby, for 1890–1899, was 19 cents, while the average for 1908 was 27 cents, an increase of 42 per cent.

The average wholesale price per quintal for codfish, dry, bank, large, for 1890–1899, was $5.58, while that for 1908 was $7.30, an increase of 30 per cent.

Mackerel, salt, large 3s, shows a decrease of 20 per cent, the average wholesale price for 1890–1899 having been $14.13 per barrel, while that for 1908 was $11.35.

On the same line of information I submit, also, the following, taken from Bradstreet's for Saturday, January 15, 1910:

Those of us who remember the time when corn was selling from 15 to 17 cents, and hogs from 3 to 4 cents, and cattle were down for a long while to 3 or 4 cents, realize what it meant. Any of us that have been engaged in any agricultural occupation must be pleased to think the time has come when the man who tills the soil is coming into his own. [Applause.]

It might be interesting to cite here some figures showing the total value of farm products in the United States for 1909. The Secretary of Agriculture, in his report, estimates that the total value of such products in the United States in 1909 was $8,760,000,000, an increase over 1908 of $8,760,000. A paper from the United States Geological Survey, just issued, estimates that the total value of the output of precious metals in the United States for 1909 was $127,243,303, showing that the value of farm products in the United States for the past year was $8,632,757,700 more than that of the output of precious metals.

I notice that the Secretary of Agriculture has said that we want to educate 10,000 farmers. Oh, the best kind of education we can get to bring men back to the farm is to have their time better worth while. The increased price of farm products will do more to check the rush to the city than any agricultural education that you can give. There are only a certain limited number of men that can be educated for an academic pursuit. Few, perhaps, take up agriculture for the very love of it, and take up the study of plant life or the breeding of animals for the same reason. The great majority of the people of this country who take up agriculture carry it on because they think it is a suitable way in which to make a living, and if the present prices continue this tremendous flow of people from the farms will stop. I am sorry to say that in too many instances our brightest young men do leave the farms and go to the cities, and not always have they made more than had they remained at home. But the conditions are more attractive there. They do not have to get dirty; they do not have to be out in all sorts of weather; they do not have to take care of the stock every day of the year. In many of the occupations there are no Sundays or holidays on a farm. A few, like myself, choose the occupation because they prefer it.

I deliberately made the choice when a young man of the occupation of the farmer, because I liked it, and I like it yet, and I am willing to receive a much less remuneration than I would be willing to receive for some occupation that kept me indoors all the time.

I have some figures here that show the trend of population to the cities, and it seems to me very clear that these high prices have come to stay unless there is a change in conditions. In 1790, 3.4 per cent of our people lived in the cities. The proportion gradually rose, until in 1840 we had only 8.5 per cent; in 1850, 12 per cent; and in 1860, 16 per cent. The next decade saw 20 per cent, the next 22 per cent, and in 1890 we had 29 per cent, a tremendous increase from 1880. In 1900 we had 33⅓ per cent of our population in our cities of over 8,000. The Census Bureau now estimates that the next census will show that 40 per cent of our population live in incorporated villages and cities, but even this does not include those residing in villages, because in many parts of the country villages of several thousand population are not incorporated, and that is true in my own district. I think a large number of villages with 5,000 population are not incorporated. Hence in the census figures they would not show. I firmly believe that on the 1st day of June, 1910, 50 per cent of our population will be living in cities and villages. If this thing goes on it can not help increasing the price of all sorts of farm products, and it seems to me that the only thing to do is to see to it that the middleman is not absorbing too much of the profit. But it seems to me economical conditions will take care of that, because if there is more money to be made by the middleman than by anybody else in any particular line of business, others will naturally be attracted to that business.

I hope that if anybody has an idea whereby we can make it possible that the chief return shall come to the producer, he will offer it here. My own idea is that it can only be done along the line of regulation of freight rates or something of that sort. I believe discriminations are made to-day by railroads in favor of certain products from certain points, and sometimes, although I have not been able to get the figures from the Interstate Commerce Commission, I have reason to believe that the price of transporting live stock from Chicago to Liverpool or London is not much greater than it is from the same point to New York or Boston.

Right here I desire to offer some interesting data taken from a reprint from the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for 1908, entitled "Agricultural Statistics, 1908:"

LIVE CATTLE.

In 1904 we exported 593,409 live cattle, valued at $42,256,291.
In 1906 we exported 584,239, valued at $42,081,170.
In 1908 we exported 349,210, valued at $29,339,134.

LIVE SWINE.

In 1904 we exported 6,345, valued at $53,180.
In 1906 we exported 59,170, valued at $630,998.
In 1908 we exported 30,818, valued at $307,202.

HORSES.

In 1904 we exported 42,000, valued at $3,189,100.
In 1906 we exported 40,087, valued at $4,365,981.
In 1908 we exported 19,000, valued at $2,612,587.

EGGS.

The increase in the export of eggs between 1904 and 1908 was approximately 6,000,000 dozen, the increase in value being approximately from $400,000 to $7,500,000.

BUTTER.

In 1904 we exported 10,700,000 pounds, valued at $1,768,000.
In 1906 we exported 27,300,000 pounds, valued at $4,922,000.
In 1908 we exported 6,000,000 pounds, valued at $1,407,000.

BACON, HAMS, AND SALTED PORK.

In 1904 we exported 556,839,666 pounds, valued at $56,268,007.
In 1908 we exported 612,465,500 pounds, valued at $63,980,959.

Our total value of exports of animal products for 1908 was $238,522,154; the total value of cotton exports was $437,788,202; and the total value of grain and grain products for 1908 was $215,462,000.

The total of our agricultural exports, including forest products, for 1908, was valued at $1,107,725,447; excluding forest products, it was valued at $1,017,396,404, showing a decrease over 1907 of $37,000,000, but an increase over 1904 of $158,236,140.

The sum of the total value of the exports of animal products, cotton products, and grain and grain products for 1908 was $891,772,356, so that the total value of the other agricultural exports for 1908 was $215,986,091.

Also, from the same publication, I have ascertained that the average freight rate from Chicago to New York on cattle since 1881 has decreased from 35 cents a hundred to 28 cents. Hogs and sheep for nearly that entire period have been transported for 30 cents a hundred, and horses during the entire period at 60 cents a hundred.

Dressed beef in 1881 was being carried for 56 cents a hundred, but in 1887 it reached the high point of 62 cents a hundred, and since then the rate has been steady at 45 cents a hundred, except in 1890, when the rate was 39 cents.

I have been unable to learn from the Interstate Commerce Commission what the rate is on dressed beef and meat products from points in the United States to European points, and while there seems to be a general disposition to believe that the rate is less, still I have not been able to find any figures that would bear out that statement, although we do have figures to bear out the statement that material is transported from European points to points within the United States at a lower rate than it is from New York to points west of the Missouri.

These figures, taken from a report of the Interstate Commerce Committee to the Senate in 1903, show that the rates on a number of products is less from Liverpool and Antwerp to Chicago than from New York to Chicago and points west. This is notably true of cement and plate glass.

At the hearing in New York the manager of the Vulcanite Portland Cement Company stated that the rates on cement to East St. Louis, St. Louis, and Kansas City from Hamburg and Antwerp are less than from Vulcanite, N. J. He also said that labor and coal are much more expensive here than in either Hamburg or Antwerp; that these are the principal items which enter into the cost of manufacturing cement; and that because of the low prices at which foreign cement is sold in this country he felt certain that the differences in rates in favor of the imported article are in many instances sufficient to entirely offset the customs duty thereon. A similar complaint pertaining to certain kinds of plate glass was made at the hearing in Washington by a representative of the Pittsburg Plate Glass Company; and at the hearing in Chicago it was shown by the general freight agent of the Illinois Central Railroad Company that salt has often been shipped from Liverpool through the port of New Orleans to Chicago for a less rate than that contemporaneously in force between New Orleans and Chicago on domestic shipments of that article. However, it was said that such shipments seldom, if ever, originate at New Orleans.

Generally speaking, we find bills of lading applying to imported traffic as follows: One form states a through rate, either according to measurement or weight; another reads "as per agreement," and often as per agreement with a shipper named; the third is simply the inland bill of lading of the carrier in this country. Because of the manner in which these rates are made, it may often happen that the inland carrier does not know the amount of the through rate. The carriers here solicit import business through foreign agents. The agent may be an employee of the carrier to whom a regular salary is paid, or, as is more often the case, a person engaged in other business who works for such carrier on commission. The commission is said to be 10 per cent of the inland rate on articles paying first, second, or third class rates, and 5 per cent on articles paying fourth, fifth, or sixth class rates. It is claimed that no commission is paid on articles carried at commodity rates, but as the solicitor is usually a customs broker or insurance agent the customs fees or insurance premiums he may obtain induce him to solicit the traffic. It was shown that in many instances the American Express Company acts as such agent, and is paid for its services by commissions, as above stated.

Through rates are made either by such agents, by the inland carriers here, or by the ocean carriers. If by the former, they may represent in each instance the result of combining the ocean with the inland rate, or they may be either more or less than such combination. The agent apparently makes any rate he sees fit, and may use his commission for the purpose of offering a lower rate than the combination, but it is said that he must in all cases protect personally the rate named by him, so far, at least, as the inland carrier is concerned. As the ocean rates are often made according to measurement, while it is claimed that inland rates are always applied according to weight, and as in many cases the traffic is not weighed until it reaches a port of entry in the United States, it is evident that the agent has to do some guessing, and can not always be certain that the rate named by him represents the total amount that will be charged by the carriers for transportation.

The ocean carrier is also at liberty to make any through rate it pleases, though according to the testimony the inland carrier must be paid its established and published proportion in cases where the inland proportion has been established and published. Ocean rates are constantly fluctuating, and for this reason whenever the inland carrier wishes to name a through rate it must make some definite arrangement with the ocean carrier. But the way much of this import business is done leaves the carriers free to make such through rates from time to time as they think will be to their advantage without reference to how their action may affect dealers in domestic articles of like kinds and classes. Even where through rates are named in bills of lading the rate specified may not correspond with the fact. It was explained that items are often included in the rate named that are not, strictly speaking, a part of the transportation charges, and, where the amount of the rate is not mentioned, it is said that the information is withheld to prevent one agent from finding out what rates are being made by another.

As the business is carried on at present inland carriers are free to make low rates on imported articles without the necessity of making corresponding rates on domestic articles of like kinds and classes; and the traffic manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company stated that, in his opinion, if the Congress should enact a law providing that the rates must be the same on both classes of traffic, inland carriers would in many instances make domestic rates that would be lower than those now in force. He said it often happens that rail carriers are requested to make rates on imported articles where they have no domestic traffic of a like kind, and that under such a law these carriers could make a low import rate and a domestic rate to correspond therewith without suffering any diminution in the revenue derived from their domestic traffic, while other carriers which have domestic traffic of a like kind would be compelled to choose between a diminution of the revenue derived therefrom and the loss of such revenue as they might otherwise secure from import traffic.

Why should we allow such things to go on? And if our people are selling stuff to the foreigner, selling cattle and hogs to the foreigner, cheaper than they sell them to us, how we shall reach a solution of that problem I know not. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to yield to my colleague from Kansas [Mr. REEDER] thirty minutes.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, we have passed the Payne tariff bill, and it must stand or fall on its success in producing necessary revenue and at the same time permitting good wages and general employment of American labor.

The Republican party is responsible for that bill.

If good effects follow, Democrats or their allies will find it difficult to conceal the fact by any trumped-up issues. History having been made as to tariff legislation as far as the immediate future is concerned, I shall pass to some of the things now claiming our attention.

While we are a great nation of world-wide influence and usefulness, great questions of vital importance press for solution at every session of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the importance of the subjects I rise to discuss is such that I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I read from manuscript, largely. This speech is not intended for home consumption. I sincerely hope to influence some of my colleagues in their conclusions on several very important subjects which we will be called upon to consider this session or in the not distant future. Among these questions is the subject of entering upon a debt-producing era of unusual dimensions.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, the people of this country seem to be in the throes of a bond-issuing craze. I know full well that with the growth of a nation, as with that of an individual, its wants and its needs expand. I know that the man can not wear the garments of the boy. At the same time—to pursue this simile just a little further—the man should look to it that in providing himself with proper habiliments he does not bankrupt his estate or leave behind him a debt so large that it will prove a source of great annoyance to his posterity.

The interest-bearing debt of the United States in 1840 was but $3,573,344. From that time on it rose until in 1867 it had reached the enormous figure of nearly two and a quarter billions. On July 1, 1908, it was $897,500,000. For several years past enterprises of great moment have been undertaken by the Government involving an increase of the national debt. Congress has authorized the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, an undertaking which, in all probability, will cost five hundred millions before it is finished; and if, as a good many well-informed people believe, the present lock canal will ultimately have to be changed to a sea-level canal, it will cost a half billion more. So here is a prospective billion addition to our debt.

Whether or not the impetus to the prevailing popular demand for government bond issues was given by the Panama Canal undertaking I am unable to say, but there can be no doubt that the demand exists. It has reached the proportions of a craze. Bonds for waterways, bonds for highways, bonds for rivers and harbors, bonds for a dozen different things. Our people seem to have forgotten the trite saying that "he who borrows must also pay." The day of settlement comes sometime.

The idea that a public debt is a public blessing has long since been exploded. To-day that country is held up to the admiration of the world no abnormally large portion of whose revenues is required for interest or sinking-fund charges, but whose current revenues generally meet its expenditures. There are not more than one or two such, but a few years ago the hope was justified that the United States might soon be enrolled in that class. That hope is past; we are in the very maelstrom of bond-issue ravings. Is it not meet that we should halt and seek to get our bearings?

What would be thought of a business man who borrows and borrows, just because his credit is good, and who spends the borrowed money lavishly in all sorts of more or less profitable enterprises? How long would it take to weaken his credit and undermine the stability of his business? Would not his financial ruin be almost a certainty? Now, it will be conceded, I suppose, by everybody that the fundamental principles that govern business are the same in the case of the individual and that of the Government. There is, however, this difference: In the case of the Government a greater liberty is taken in the application of funds.

The Government of the United States is collecting an annual revenue of nearly $1,000,000,000. It is spending more than its income, as the deficit at the close of the last fiscal year showed. However, Republicans expect that the Payne tariff bill will prevent further deficits and not deprive the laboring man of work at good wages.

If this vast sum were collected by direct taxes there would be a howl from one end of the country to the other, and an immediate and persistent demand for drastic retrenchment. But under our system of indirect taxation the burden is felt simply in the increased cost of living. This is ascribed to all causes but the right one, and from all sides comes the cry for public improvements, no matter whether current revenues are sufficient or not, no matter how many millions in bonds have to be issued. In this case certainly, Mr. Chairman, the voice of the people is not the voice of God, and we who are sent here to safeguard the people's interests should go slow before we yield to such clamor.

Only a few weeks ago the River and Harbor Congress held its sessions in this city, and one of the features of its programme—in fact, the feature that stands out in boldest relief—is the demand that the Government shall issue from five hundred millions to a billion dollars' worth of bonds, the proceeds to be applied in annual installments to the improvement of rivers and harbors and the creation of a great system of deep waterways from the Lakes to the Gulf, and in other sections of the country. Improvements of this character are intrinsically proper. They are distinctly in the line of policy covered by the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Practical benefits are certain to arise from them, not only to the sections immediately affected, but to the whole country, if they are permanently constructed, and the streams can be utilized when made navigable. For these and many other reasons they are to be highly commended, and I shall be the last person to raise an objection against them, if they can be accomplished without too great a sacrifice on the part of the present or succeeding generations. Too great a sacrifice is involved, Mr. Chairman, in the huge bond issue which we are invited to authorize.

I realize, of course, the alluring aspect of this proposition which holds out promise of a "pork barrel" of unusually large dimensions. Indeed, it almost staggers the imagination to grasp the possibilities of that barrel. "Pork" for politicians, "pork" for contractors, "pork" for anybody anywhere that has anything to sell, from shoestrings to steam dredges. For, will not the money "go among the people," and will not the country store and the corner grocery do a land-office business when such a joyful consummation comes to pass? Why should anyone be troubled by the thought that an issue of a billion dollars of 3 per cent bonds means an additional annual interest charge of $30,000,000, which has to come out of the pockets of the people? Would it not be as well to pause a moment and inquire who is to be advantaged by the process of taking this money from one pocket and putting it into another? We are told that the people will be benefited to the extent of many million dollars every year by the improvements to be inaugurated under this bond-issue dispensation. Granting this, the indisputable fact remains that the people—several generations of the people—are themselves made to pay for them.

No one will question the benefits to our people of such a policy of waterway improvements as was outlined by the River and Harbor Congress. But how the distribution of a "pork barrel" can bring about such benefits is difficult to determine. That, Mr. Chairman, can possibly be figured out by some Democrat, college professor, or magazine writer, whose peculiarly constituted reasoning powers make it easy for them to believe that our goods can be manufactured in foreign lands and our workingmen have the same steady employment and just as good wages as if these goods were manufactured in our own country. They also seem able to bring themselves to believe that men working one or two days each week at low wages will buy just as much of the farmer's products and pay as high a price as when they have steady employment at good wages.

The beneficence of general bond issuing or of reducing the tariff to an extent which will cause most of the goods we use to be manufactured by foreigners may appear to visionaries, but the practical business world knows better.

Nothing could be further from my intention, sir, than an attempt to question the motives or disparage the efforts of the many eminent gentlemen who compose the River and Harbor Congress and formulated this demand for hundreds of millions of bonds. I doubt, however, if they, or a majority of them, realize the actual results that would flow from such legislation.

The avalanche of interest-bearing obligations that will naturally flow in on us if we open this floodgate will appall us all. No well-digested programme of proposed improvements accompanies the demand for this enormous bond issue. Congress is simply asked to provide for such an issue and indicate the work to be undertaken. With the utmost deference to and respect for the skill of the engineer service of the United States Army, to whom the execution of this work would be committed, I seriously apprehend great difficulty, with our present information, in the proper handling of the various projects. Our experience with the Mississippi River is not so encouraging as to inspire confidence in the ultimate success of the enterprises that lie slumbering in the womb of the future and only wait the magic touch of millions of bonds to awaken them into life. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, it appears more than probable that before the bonds are paid a large part of the works constructed with the proceeds would be washed out, and only serve as nuclei for such sand bars as we observed on similar works on our recent trip from St. Louis to New Orleans.

In one particular the scheme is quite practical—the suggested bond issue is large enough to reach a long way 'round after the necessary votes, with ample provision that after the votes in this House have been made safe, there can be a sufficient inducement offered to secure the requisite votes in the Senate. Let us say, for instance, that Chicago should present a feasible scheme—which, by the way, she can not do—for voting a big issue of bonds to dig her ditch, by which she hopes to force the people for 600 miles west of the Missouri River to freight their goods to and across this great natural waterway and three to five hundred miles farther to gain the privilege of sending their goods to the Gulf through a ditch, it will readily be seen that all the people of that vast region, headed by Kansas City, Omaha, and the other cities on the Missouri, would insist that they, too, be let in on the bond game; and if they were not, they would not play. On the other hand, to let them in and give them their share of the swag—if I may be permitted to use that word—would probably mean a sheer waste of whatever amount would be allotted to them. For thus far no one has advanced so well-considered a plan for controlling the Missouri River floods as to justify the hope that some big freshet would not wash the works out of the river or move the river over to where it would not be obstructed by them.

Right at this point I want to offer a suggestion to those who favor these huge engineering works to control floods in our rivers. It is this: The only way to control the Missouri or any other great river carrying big floods through a light alluvial soil is at the point where the rains fall that cause the floods. The merest tyro in engineering knows that floods can be more readily controlled at the source of a river than after the river has become an unmanageable torrent.

The Missouri can be controlled at its source for less money than the damage it causes costs in any ten-year period. Why, then, will engineers persist in their efforts to control the river after the flood has attained its maximum force? Lack of time forbids my entering upon a protracted discussion of this phase of the subject. I will only add that under the national irrigation law sufficient of the waters of the Missouri are impounded annually to cover 2,500,000 acres of land to the depth of 1 foot, and the amount is being largely increased every year.

Another reason, and one which alone should prevent us from voting from one-half to one billion dollars in bonds to improve our waterways, is that we can not utilize them even after they have been put in a prime condition for commerce. Evidently the advocates of the scheme have quite lost sight of the competitive point rates now granted by all the railroads and highly prized by all cities that enjoy the benefits of such rates. By this means the railroad companies put an effective check on the shipping of freight by boats, and whatever losses they sustain in this way they more than make up by the charges on freight from noncompetitive points. Thus they destroy competition by boats. This feature of the case seemingly can not now be remedied, because all the large cities and many of the smaller ones derive such benefits from this arrangement that they can be counted on to fight to the last ditch to retain their advantage. All the railroads, of course, will fight any attempt to remedy this injustice, and we know from experience, Mr. Chairman, that among them they have the votes.

There can be no question, sir, that we are not now justified in yielding to this clamor for huge bond issues to improve or construct waterways until we have demonstrated by the judicious use of funds which we can spare from our current annual revenues that we know how to control floods, nor even then until we are able in some way to prevent the railroads from interfering with the use of river freighters by means of discrimination in rates. No great damage would be done if we were to squander quite a considerable amount of current revenues in futile experiments such as we have engaged in for years passed. But to vote millions of dollars' worth of bonds and waste the proceeds, leaving it to the future citizen to pay them, and have nothing of permanent value to show for the money, that would be worse than folly. It would be criminal.

Let me point out another line on which the bond-issue craze has developed. Most of our people who are interested in irrigation are shouting for bond issues, and bills are introduced in Congress that involve the piling up of a load of debt to burden the citizen of the future. No one appreciates more than I do the great benefits sure to flow from our irrigation policy. It is one of the wisest movements ever inaugurated by the Government of the United States, for it will make of our deserts fertile lands, which will support at least forty millions of people, twenty-five millions of whom will be home owners and draw their sustenance directly from Mother Earth. No other conditions produce so high a grade of citizenship. Yet I do not believe we would be justified in countenancing this bond-issuing craze even for such work as this. We have about $55,000,000 in the irrigation fund, and the conditions for securing the benefits of this vast sum are equitable to the home builder.

It is a well-known fact that by means of the timber and stone act and our lieu-land laws double the amount now in that almost sacred fund has been diverted into the pockets of speculators. To that extent the irrigation fund has been robbed. I have a statement from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, from which it appears that in the fiscal years 1902 to 1909 there were entered under the timber and stone act more than 8,566,000 acres. For the whole fiscal year 1909, 722,836 acres were entered under that act, but of this amount over 500,000 acres were entered before the modified regulations of November 30, 1908. These regulations had the effect of restricting the entries, and thus saving millions to the irrigation fund but for the lieu-land scrip still out. But it is deplorable to contemplate the indisputable fact that by reason of the timber and stone entries prior to January 1, 1909, at least $85,000,000 have gone into the hands of speculators that ought to be in the irrigation fund, and much more under the lieu-land laws. President Roosevelt exerted himself to the utmost to have the timber and stone law repealed, and in his conservation message President Taft urges the same. If all those especially interested now in issuing bonds to increase this fund had aided President Roosevelt in his most laudable endeavor, the fund would now be more than ample for all purposes. Of course, some speculators would not have quite so large a bank account.

An important reason why I can not favor a bond issue for the benefit of the irrigation fund is that when the national irrigation law was under discussion in this House several of us labored with Members who did not then fully appreciate the benefits that would arise from such legislation, and in order to induce them to vote for the bill we promised them that no other funds should be asked of Congress with our consent for this purpose in any form or shape until we had irrigated the desert, put settlers on the land, and the money expended had been returned to the Treasury by these settlers.

This has not yet been accomplished to such an extent as to justify us in favoring legislation such as is now proposed. An issue of bonds for the purpose would also probably bring from the West a demand that we cancel this reasonable obligation upon the settlers to return to the Treasury in small amounts, without interest, the money which had been used to irrigate their lands, and thereby in the end less irrigating would be done by the Government than will be accomplished without an issue of bonds.

Before I close, Mr. Chairman, I want to say just another word about that "pork barrel." I want to prove from the public press that what I have said on this score was no exaggeration. East and West, North and South, are setting up a cry for bonds. But it is not a harmonious cry; it is full already of discords. One section is afraid that another section may get more "pork" than number one, and, as I said before, section yells unto section: "If you don't let us into the game, we won't play." On the 9th day of December, Mr. Chairman, the river and harbor congress formulated its demand for this huge bond issue. The very next day the Philadelphia Inquirer said editorially:

> There is in evidence at the start the usual tendency of Congressmen from certain Western and Southern States to combine to hog most of the available money for the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

A few days later, on December 13, the same paper came out with an editorial under the caption "What! a billion for the Mississippi?" the concluding paragraph of which reads significantly thus:

> The East is perfectly willing to go along with the Mississippi Valley people in anything that is reasonable, but the East expects in return the support of the West for practical projects that can not fail to be of immense importance on the Atlantic. There must be unity if anything is to be accomplished at all.

There we have it. You tickle me and I'll tickle you. Each wants his slice of "pork," no matter who pays for it in the end, and the real good that will be accomplished does not enter into the consideration. The New York Sun puts the case in a nutshell when it says:

> The country is unfortunately inclined, owing to the craft of industrious publicity agents, to become waterways mad. If sober counsels do not prevail, it will end by becoming bond-issue mad.

If there were urgent need for a great bond issue to meet some great national emergency, I should be the last person to object to it, because I am for anything that will make my country more prosperous and its people happier. No such emergency, however, exists. Such a bond issue as is now clamored for would be, in my judgment, a colossal mistake, the bitter fruits of which would vex generation after generation of our posterity.

Now I yield to any questions.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I noted the remarks of the gentleman as to his idea that if the timber and stone act were repealed it would very much increase the revenues from public lands that could be used for national irrigation projects. I would like to ask the gentleman what sort of plan he has in mind for getting revenue out of lands of that sort?

Mr. REEDER. I would sell the timber on the land for something near its value and put the proceeds into the irrigation fund.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. At the present time we have a great deal of our available forests in forest reserves, and are pursuing the system of selling timber from them; would the gentleman put these additional areas in forest reserves?

Mr. REEDER. No; I would not. My judgment is that President Roosevelt put much of our forests into reserves as the only available method he had to prevent speculators from getting a much larger per cent of the public's timber supply than they have secured by means of the timber and stone law and lieu-land scrip. I think if we could have the lieu-land land repealed, or make the lieu-land scrip only available for six months after it was issued, it would be much better. Now, as to making forest reserves: Personally I believe that all the rough land of this country, too rough for cultivation, should be set to trees of such varieties as will make valuable timber, and cared for scientifically. By this means we would have sufficient timber for future necessities.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course, we are at present selling the timber from the forest reserves, but the gentleman understands that not enough revenue is realized from that source to pay the expenses of the reserves, without any regard to accumulating a fund for irrigation; and so I say, I was curious to know what sort of land policy the gentleman had in mind that would save many millions for the irrigation fund from this land.

Mr. REEDER. I know of land sold under the timber and stone act at $2.50 per acre from which 40,000 feet board measure can be cut per acre, and some of that timber has been sold at $4.40 a thousand feet this past year. The loss to the irrigation was the value of the timber minus the $2.50 received per acre for the same.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Your plan would not be, then, to sell the lands at all, but to sell the timber upon them?

Mr. REEDER. I would sell the timber that grows upon the land and let settlers take all of the land which will make homes. But all the rough land that is absolutely unfit for cultivation I believe the Government ought to own for all time and make it constantly produce trees under the direction of a forestry service.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course at the present time timber and stone lands are appraised before sale and must be sold for the appraised value, and the proceeds of the sales go to the irrigation fund.

Mr. REEDER. By the policy adopted last year. Now, if we could prevent speculators from taking this timber with the lieu-land scrip and from securing our best coal lands by the same process, much good would result for the future, both to the irrigation fund and to coming generations in many other ways.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have always been opposed to the issuance of lieu-land scrip, and took an active part in having the lieu-land selection provisions of forest-reserve act repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEISSE. If the gentleman will allow a minute, so that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not within the province of the Chair to yield the time; that is under the control of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. LAMB. I give the gentleman one minute.

Mr. WEISSE. The gentleman from Kansas spoke about the waterways and the freight rate. Mr. Chairman, we are to-day getting hides from Buenos Aires, South America, to New York for 25 cents a hundred. From Chicago to Sheboygan, Wis., on Lake Michigan, with waterway the 140 miles, the freight is 40 cents a hundred. Now, if you pass this waterways bill, I want to know if the gentleman thinks we are going to have a lower rate on that 140 miles than we have from Buenos Aires to New York? Whether the ship-subsidy bill will lower the freight from Buenos Aires to New York? And I would like him to state if they are not demanding the ship-subsidy bill in order to get lower freight rates from South America.

The rate on dry hides from Mississippi points to Sheboygan Falls is from $2 to $2.30 a hundred pounds, and we have at present a waterway transportation most of the distance. The ship-subsidy bill no doubt will not lower these rates. I believe we need to adjust our rates at home first, so our shippers will get the benefit of a reasonable rate, and not confine ourselves to foreign freight rates as long as we have these conditions existing at home, in our country.

With the permission of the gentleman, I insert a letter, showing the foreign freight rates, from a New York broker:

JANUARY 22, 1910.

Hon. CHARLES H. WEISSE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your favor 20th instant, and beg to say that after making inquiries at several of the steamship offices and freight brokers, we find that the rates at present are about as follows:

Dry hides, Buenos Aires to New York, 25 cents per 100 pounds.
Dry hides, London to New York, 25 to 32 cents per 100 pounds.
Dry hides, Hamburg to New York, 30 to 35 cents per 100 pounds.

Should you require any further information, we would be pleased to try and furnish same to you.

Thanking you for your assurances, we are,
Yours, truly,
A. H. HEYMANN & Co.

Mr. REEDER. If you had railroads running directly alongside the line where the boats run and there were towns all along that line, they would give a rate that would soon put your boats out of business, and then you would have a higher rate.

Mr. WEISSE. The boats and the railroads reach exactly the same points. The boat companies and railroads pool together, and the rates are the same over either line at present, as we are shipping goods both ways.

Mr. LAMB. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to call the attention of the Members of this House to what to my mind was a very remarkable order issued by the President of the United States along in November and directed to the heads of various executive departments of the Government. I dislike to assail any order until I know why the order was issued. But, to be perfectly frank, I can conceive of no good reason why such an order as I will call to your attention was ever issued. I shall not discuss the first half of the order, but I want to call attention of Members of this body and the Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol to all of this remarkable order, issued by the Chief Executive of the United States, in order that you may understand the whole of it, and for this purpose I will read the first part of it and then will only discuss that portion which refers to Representatives and to Senators. By way of parenthesis I will say that Congressmen have made requests for information in these executive departments and have been met with this order and have been denied it. It has already caused quite a good deal of inconvenience.

The order is as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

It is hereby ordered that no bureau, office, or division chief, or subordinate in any department of the Government, and no officer of the Army or Navy or Marine Corps stationed in Washington, shall apply to either House of Congress, or to any committee of either House of Congress, or to any Member of Congress, for legislation, or for appropriations, or for congressional action of any kind, except with the consent and knowledge of the head of the department; nor shall any such person respond to any request for information from either House of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, or any Member of Congress, except through, or as authorized by, the head of his department.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 26, 1909.

I have no particular objection to the first portion of the order. There is one clause which is subject to some very just criticism, but I pass it over, and I call the attention of the House to the last clause of the order and ask this body, placing any construction on it that is reasonable, if they believe it is a wise and just order?

The latter clause of this remarkable order is as follows:

Nor shall any such person respond to any request for information from either House of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, or any Member of Congress, except through, or as authorized by, the head of his department.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 26, 1909.

I do not desire to be interrupted, because my time is short; but for this I would be glad to yield to anyone. If after I have concluded my remarks on this subject I have any time left, I will be glad to answer any question propounded to me and will be glad to hear any defense of the order that friends of the President care to make. First, I will ask some questions about the order and let them be answered by the country in the future.

Why was this order issued?

What good purpose can it serve?

Was the order issued because of the Ballinger-Pinchot trouble?

Has the Executive the right to issue such an order?

If he has the right, is it a wise order?

If it is a good order, is it wise to issue it now in view of the pending investigation of one of the departments?

Does the order in any way reflect upon the House or Senate?

If a Congressman or a Senator should be unable, when he wanted any information, to find the Cabinet officer, under this order how could he get information that he needed at once? [Applause.]

If this order is permitted to go without challenge, does it not assume that the Executive has the right to control the information that Congressmen may get out of any department? [Applause.]

Does it not assume that if the Executive should not want Congress to get information about any matter that he may refuse that information entirely and peremptorily? [Applause.]

If this order is within the power of the Executive, could he not prevent anyone in any department giving information to any committee or commission of Congress?

Has the Executive the right, by order, to have information which Congress and the Senate may request censored by a Cabinet officer before they get it? [Applause.]

Is this order an executive usurpation of power?

If it is not, then does it follow that all information, facts, data, and records, which might greatly affect legislation, will be under the control of the executive department?

If the Executive controls information upon which legislation is based, is it not tantamount to controlling legislation? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

How long will it be before the Executive will be sending for Members of Congress and courteously, politely, and diplomatically, but positively, give them their orders about what they must do? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

How long, then, before we will have a Russian bureaucracy?

Is this order enforced against all Congressmen and Senators alike?

Is this order fairly and strictly applied to Republicans and Democrats alike?

Have the bureau chiefs any private information from any source of authority to exempt any pets from this order?

Do the Republicans as a party indorse this order?

If they do not, why have they not protested?

Under this order, could not a private citizen get information from a bureau chief or employee without violating the order?

If this is a government of coordinate branches, why should the Executive prescribe rules for the legislative department, and by what authority?

When Congress creates a bureau in any department of the Government for the purpose of obtaining information for the use and benefit of all, has the Executive the right, because Congress vests him with the authority to appoint such an officer, by and with the consent of the Senate, to control the actions of such bureau chief and vest him, the chief, with the power and right to say to the United States Senate and to the House of Representatives: "Both of your bodies can not make me give a civil answer to you or one particle of information without permission of my Cabinet officer and with all your legislative powers, backed up by 90,000,000 American people, whom you represent, giving you that power. I have behind me my Cabinet officer, and we are more powerful than you all, Constitution or no Constitution, and I will not answer?"

Does this order not bear more of the earmarks of Louis XIV of France than that of a President of the United States?

If Congress submits to this order without protest, how long before the whole country will justly have a contempt for the whole body?

Does Congress fail to protest because it is afraid of the loss of patronage, which the President may or may not withhold?

Do the departments prefer darkness to light because their deeds are evil, and does the Executive want to keep the lid on until he thinks best to take it off?

If he does, will he take it off after the next congressional election, or is the order a precedent set during a Republican House of Representatives as an excuse to keep it on in the event the House is Democratic next time?

Or will the Executive keep it on until after the next presidential election and, in the event he is reelected, then take it off?

Or will he then wait until his successor is elected, and then allow his successor to take it off or leave it on, as he sees fit?

Or will the American people get curious and desire to look under the lid and change the administration from a Republican to a Democratic administration? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These questions are suggested by this order. It is to be hoped that the President has some good reason for issuing this order. It is to be hoped that it was not an order for the purpose of concealing any matter that Congress should be informed about. We can not believe, we resent and repel the insinuation, that this order was issued to prevent fraud and misdoing being discovered in the various executive departments. I do not suppose that any Congressman or Senator would even insinuate that the President has this in mind. It must spring from a distrust of the accuracy of the statements that might be made by the chiefs of the bureaus, or else it springs from a desire to have the Cabinet officers thoroughly informed as to what information is being given out, for what purpose, and by whom obtained. I do not think that either of these reasons is sound. First, because the chiefs of these bureaus will necessarily know more about the matters directly under them than the Cabinet officers could possibly know. The bureau chiefs are presumed to be, until the contrary is shown, just as honest and just as accurate and just as truthful and just as worthy of belief as are the Cabinet officers. At any rate, the law presumes this. If the President has such a distrust of the departments under him, then there should be a wholesale investigation of every department and of every bureau of every department. I think this House would repel any insinuation that any Cabinet officer would have the right to determine what information should be given to them about any matter they desired to know about. If the Cabinet officers should have the right to deny information to a Congressman or a Senator or a committee of either House or to either House itself, then the arbiter of what information will be given out through the executive department will be the Cabinet itself, and Congress would be specifically denied the right to determine for itself what information it was entitled to.

If the order springs from the distrust of Congress and the use that it might make of information obtained through the executive branch of the Government, then it necessarily means that the only branch of the Government that directly represents the people can not be relied upon to do that which is to the best interest of their constituents and the country. That is to say, the people's representatives in Congress, who speak for the people, can not determine for themselves what information they shall have, and this means that the people themselves shall only have such information about their Government as the Cabinet officers are willing that they shall have. This means that a Cabinet that spends a billion dollars annually of the people's money is responsible to no power on earth save to themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We can not believe that the President or the Cabinet can have any such view of this order; yet, when read literally, it means exactly this. If we take a more liberal construction of the order, then, we think it ill advised and inconvenient. If every request of every Congressman and every Senator for information must be referred to the Cabinet officer for his permission to give the information, then such Cabinet officer would have to read thousands, yea, millions of letters, unless the order is violated every hour of every day and every minute of every hour. It is often as easy to get an interview with or the sight of the Czar of Russia as it is a Cabinet officer. I am not complaining at this difficulty of seeing a Cabinet officer, because this will always be true in every government as great as ours. But to construe the order literally, if a Congressman or Senator desires information for immediate use, he would not only find it inconvenient but in many cases absolutely impossible to get the information which he desired for immediate use. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Heretofore, so far as I have been able to know from personal contact with the members of the President's Cabinet and all the chiefs and employees in all the departments, they have been uniformly courteous, polite, and glad to serve a Congressman when they can do so, and I do not think that the Congressmen or the Senators have, as a rule, violated or trespassed upon these privileges, and a very kind and friendly relationship has always existed between all the officers and employees connected with the departments and the Senators and Congressmen.

This order, however, will have a tendency to license the chiefs and employees to be arrogant, and indeed they will be compelled, under this order, to have no communication of any kind in reference to matters in their departments with Congressmen and Senators, except with the permission of the Cabinet officer. In this way obtaining information is not only made disagreeable, but more difficult. I believe in making it easier to get information. I believe that information should be readily accessible to every Congressman and Senator, and should be had for the asking as a matter of right and not as a matter of grace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not think that the Executive should have the light placed under a bushel, but have it set upon a hill. I do not think that Congressmen and Senators should be rebuffed by an order of this kind, but that they should be not only invited, but encouraged to investigate the condition of every department and to thoroughly inform themselves about the needs and necessities of each department, and to ascertain any extravagance, to get information about any neglect of duty or misuse of money, and, in fact, busy themselves until they get a complete knowledge of these great departments of the Government.

This order also gives each bureau and each employee the opportunity to play favorites. It encourages them to violate the order. When some Congressman or some Senator of whom he is especially fond, or to whom he owes his appointment, asks for information, he could easily give it, for the order could be so easily violated and no harm could possibly come from it, except the harm which always follows violating orders given unwisely. On the contrary, if a Congressman or a Senator of whom he knows little, or for whom he does not especially care, or dislikes, asks for information, he could hide himself behind this order and refuse it.

From any point of view it strikes me that this is an unwise order, and one which may subject the Executive to great criticism, to say the least of it. It is an order, so far as I have been able to study it, which accomplishes no good, but will result in a great deal of harm.

I have no quarrel with the President personally. On the few occasions that I have had the opportunity of seeing him, I have been impressed with the fact that he is a man to whom everyone who knows him well will be attached personally. So far as I have seen his personality is one that attracts and does not repel. His qualities of mind and heart, so far as I know, are such that he would do no living man an intentional injustice. His administration, however, is yet in the experimental stage, and it remains to be seen whether or not he has pursued the wise course. Every true American citizen will hope and pray that he will take no thoughtless step, but that his administration will be wise, and will result in much good and many blessings to the people who have honored him by electing him to this great office. May I not be permitted to beseech the President to turn on the light and not to shut it out. As in the beginning, when darkness prevailed upon the face of the deep, the Lord said "Let there be light," now may the people of this great Republic hear the President, when there is much darkness and doubt, in humble imitation of that august scene, say politically, "Let there be light." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, during last spring I prepared in writing a detailed inquiry, seeking information through the officers of our diplomatic and consular service relative to the income-tax systems existing in the various foreign countries. This was reduced to circular form and sent by the Secretary of State to each of the officers of our diplomatic and consular service. I have received replies, in the nature of reports, from about all of those officials. They embrace synopses of income-tax systems existing in some 18 foreign governments. They are also accompanied by numerous books and other pamphlets, embracing the entire laws of each of those countries, printed, however, in their native language. I have here, Mr. Chairman, the reports of these officials relative to these systems of taxation, which I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD. I will file the books containing these laws in full in the office of the Committee on Ways and Means. Also, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD and to insert certain matters indicated in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the stupendous sugar-trust frauds recently discovered in the custom-house of New York alone had occurred in connection with the operation of an income tax, the menials and the minions of untaxed wealth would have instantly raised the cry that that tax was a farce and a failure. If an income tax, like customs duties, were uncertain and unreliable in the production of revenue, and during the Government's fiscal history had produced dozens of gaping deficits at times little expected, and as many burdensome surpluses at times still less expected, no untaxed citizen of wealth would be so poor as to do it reverence. If the bloated creature of class legislation, to whom existing laws have so long granted immunity from tax burdens, could detect the smallest symptom of inequality in an income tax, he would roll it as a sweet morsel under his tongue and solemnly pronounce that tax the bane of any revenue system of which it is a part.

Mr. Chairman, they forget that the period is rapidly disappearing when this or any other civilized nation will longer tolerate the taxation of one class for the support of another class. They forget that all the great progressive governments of the earth, whose tax systems, like ours, impose their chief burdens upon consumption, are heeding the cry for fiscal reform. But a few weeks ago the vice-president of the German parliament declared that the system of high protection, of which France, Germany, and the United States are examples, would become insupportable, and that whatever might be the future development of the economic policy of Europe, the period of high protection is approaching its end.

Mr. Chairman, our present monopoly tariff law is a miserable travesty, an ill-designed patchwork, a piece of brazen legislative jobbery. Protection to a small number of pampered, stilted individuals, not revenue for the Government, is its chief design. This indefensible doctrine has become the cancer of the Government's fiscal system. It is the mightiest engine of oppression ever devised by legislative legerdemain. It is hastening this nation to a condition of white slavery as no other influence could. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It enables a band of commercial marauders to ruthlessly take toll from the sweat and blood and life of the honest yeomanry of the land. If the piratical organization, that has knowingly foisted and fastened the existing system of tariff spoliation upon the people, persists in retaining certain of its intolerable features in the future, it may earn a degree of popular execration approaching that of a certain notorious organization known as the Black Hand.

Mr. Chairman, during the last national campaign the country was promised honest tariff reform. During last summer that promise was openly, willfully, and deliberately violated by Congress, the President acquiescing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This wanton betrayal of the American people will not soon be forgotten nor forgiven. The war for fiscal reform has not ended. It has only well commenced. It will go on until the tax-ridden people are freed from the merciless greed of organized oppression and plunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have long been of the opinion that our system of protective-tariff taxation diverts business from natural to artificial channels, causes an unequal distribution of wealth, creates money lords, impoverishes those who live upon their earnings, builds up class conditions, breeds and shelters monopolies and trusts, enabling them, vampire-like, to sap the vitality of the Nation. I am of the firm conviction that so long as this system remains, requiring the people to pay $8 to privilege for every dollar that reaches the United States Treasury, we need look no further to ascertain the chief cause of the phenomenal increase of prices in all the protected industries—the scale in this country being far above the level of the world's prices—as well as the cause of the general derangement of our industrial, economic, and social affairs.

THE REMEDY FOR EXISTING TARIFF EVILS.

Mr. Chairman, there is one, and only one, remedy adequate, speedy, and certain, namely, the complete reorganization and readjustment of our system of revenue—lopping off existing inequalities, reducing customs rates to a sound revenue basis, placing minimum rates, or none at all, on articles of prime necessity, and maximum rates on luxuries, and levying a comprehensive income tax to equalize the tax burden and to give elasticity and productiveness to our tax system. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In this connection I desire to discuss the merits of the income tax, not as a tax by itself, but as a permanent part of our whole revenue system. No one method of taxation should be considered singly, but as a part of a complete system which all taxes combine to form. The life of the Government requires an adequate revenue at all times. From its beginning the Nation's chief source of revenue has been indirect taxes levied on consumption. If our customs system, supplemented, as it now is, by an internal-revenue tax, were adequate, just, and economical, the necessity for an income tax, whatever its merits, would be measurably lessened.

But, Mr. Chairman, the essential injustice and inefficiency of our tariff laws are apparent to every intelligent observer. We should, therefore, consider our present revenue system and the effect which the income tax would have in removing its gross inequalities, in giving it productiveness and elasticity and adjusting the incidence of the whole burden. Congress has made no progress in the science of taxation since before the civil war. During much of our one hundred and twenty-three years of national life the system of collecting taxes at the custom-house has revealed startling inequalities and a singular lack of elasticity and productiveness.

ELIMINATION OF TARIFF INEQUALITIES AND SUBSTITUTION OF INCOME TAX.

Mr. Chairman, I propose now to direct attention to one ugly and fatal defect of the system now existing, viz, its inequality and injustice. The rank favoritism created by the present tariff laws would bring odium upon any political party enacting them. The taxes they impose rest mainly upon industry and consumption. The amount each citizen contributes is governed, not by his ability to pay a tax, but by his consumption of the articles taxed; and his use of them is not measured by his ability to pay taxes, but by the necessities of life. These necessaries are indispensable to the welfare—aye, the existence—of the poor. The chief burden of all tariff taxes now falls upon this class or upon the people of moderate means. Only the rich escape it. Why not the one be required to contribute out of his abundance rather than the other out of his necessities? Why should one favored class be permitted to accumulate great fortunes at the expense of others? Why not wealth bear its just proportion of the public burdens? The protected interests not only select the articles taxed, but fix the rates of taxation. A noted English statesman once said:

Conceal the hand of the taxgatherer and you can tax a people to the point of impoverishment, if not starvation, without complaint or resistance on their part.

The unequal effects of the burdensome tariff have already dwarfed not only the political and economic but the social conditions as well.

Mr. Chairman, this country has now its thousands of hungry, its tens of thousands of paupers, and its hundreds of thousands of unemployed. Verily this is an age of special privilege. Upon every hand we hear preached and see practiced the gospel of class legislation. Far is the cry, long is the stretch between great riches and extreme poverty, and those who would shield the former from taxation at the expense of the latter forget that "man shall not live by bread alone." If the modern Shylock is void of a conscience that would move him to willingly assume some of the burdens of government while claiming all the benefits of its protection, is he also without that discernment necessary to foresee the awful day of retribution that must come from a continuance of the present grinding oppression of the poor? I am reminded of a statement of Swift that "nothing is so hard for those who abound in riches as to conceive how others can be in want." The new tariff has already so increased the cost of living as to cause the gaunt specter of want and hunger to stalk into the hitherto comfortable homes of millions of freeborn American citizens. Under the operation of these unfair and unequal tax laws we no longer have competition in American markets. The prices the consumer must pay are limited only by the producer's greed of gain. Time does not now permit me to point out in detail the innumerable inequalities in our tariff that call loudly for the pruning knife. It is sufficient to say that, though not always understood, their effects are daily and deeply felt by every American consumer.

NECESSITY OF AN INCOME TAX TO GIVE ELASTICITY AND PRODUCTIVENESS TO PRESENT REVENUE SYSTEM.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to call attention to another evil coordinate with that just discussed. Our revenues are in an unsatisfactory condition. The most experienced expert shrinks from any attempt to accurately or intelligently forecast the governmental receipts. In 1905 the receipts were $544,274,684, and there was a deficit of $19,085,408. In 1907 the receipts were $663,140,334, and there was a surplus of $111,435,205; while in 1908 the receipts were $601,126,118, and, strange to say, there was a deficit of $20,000,000. For the fiscal year 1909 the receipts continued substantially the same, but there was a deficit of $58,734,954. From 1907 to 1909 there was a reduction in receipts of over $60,000,000 and an increase in expenditures of $120,000,000. Our system of revenues and expenditures is so uncertain and unreliable that a cash balance of $250,000,000 has been reduced to less than $80,000,000 within the short space of three years.

The working balance is now less than $30,000,000, while increased expenditures are making daily inroads upon it. We have a large deficit in current receipts and expenditures for the present fiscal year, and unless all signs are misleading, it will be still larger in the fiscal year of 1911. True, the present tariff law levies an enormous tax upon the people, but unfortunately the bulk of it goes to the manufacturers and trusts instead of to the Federal Treasury. To maintain an equilibrium between governmental receipts and expenditures, thereby guarding against deficits or surpluses, is a prime requisite of a sound system of taxation. It ought to be adjustable enough to thus meet the Treasury's varying demands. The Nation's experience conclusively shows that our indirect taxation has been, and is now, strikingly inelastic, unstable, inflexible, and oftentimes unproductive, both in times of peace and war. Our import duties depend largely upon the prosperity of the foreigner, while our internal-revenue taxes are levied chiefly upon whisky and tobacco.

OUR REVENUES UNSTABLE AND UNCERTAIN IN THE PAST.

A glance at the past operation of this system reveals the defects I complain of, as well as the obvious necessity for the adoption of an income tax. During the Revolutionary war taxation in any form was unpopular in the States and colonies. Hence, they turned to indirect taxation as the least objectionable method of raising revenue. After the formation of the Union in 1789, Congress followed suit. But Alexander Hamilton urged the imposition of a small internal-revenue tax, and in this he was successful. This tax immediately raised a storm of opposition, which resulted in its repeal soon after Jefferson's inauguration in 1801. This marked the establishment of the tariff tax alone as the Nation's system of taxation until the close of the civil war, for no internal tax was enacted during this entire period, save to meet some temporary exigency. Since the war the internal-revenue tax has been retained in part as a supplement or minor aid to our customs system of revenue.

From the outset there were rapid fluctuations in the national revenues. Its productiveness has been at all times very uncertain, being constantly affected either by business depression or revival at home, or by foreign wars or foreign commercial changes. From 1789 to 1811 the tide of revenue from our customs duties ebbed and flowed to such an extent as to produce nine large deficits and a still greater number of burdensome surpluses. The war of 1812, as have all other wars since that time, thoroughly proved the utter inability of customs revenues to meet war emergencies. In addition to the imposition of other taxes the Government was forced to resort to loans and the issuance of treasury notes. The real resources of the country could not, and can not now, be reached by customs duties. Following the war of 1812 the Treasury was burdened with a surplus until 1818; but after that year there was a decline of the revenues until a low ebb was reached in 1821, from which they did not recover until after the crisis of 1824. The years 1824 to 1835 witnessed phenomenal increases, far beyond governmental necessities. In 1836 the surplus became so burdensome that $28,000,000 was ordered distributed among the States. A lightning change in the customs revenues then occurred, for in 1838, before this distribution had been completed, the Treasury showed a deficit of several millions of dollars. Two loans and five issues of treasury notes were resorted to between 1837 and 1843. The Secretary of the Treasury then said:

> With sources of revenue so fluctuating we shall constantly be exposed to great deficiencies or excesses, with all their attendant embarrassments.

This statement is strikingly applicable to present-day conditions. Customs revenues wholly failed to satisfy the Government's needs during the Mexican war. By 1857 a tremendous surplus had again accumulated in the Treasury. But within a year it had entirely disappeared and the Government was forced to issue $24,000,000 in treasury notes and negotiate a loan of $10,000,000.

During the first three years of the civil war, though raised high upon every available article, the customs revenues inflexibly remained at a peace level. Secretary of the Treasury Chase, in 1863, was obliged to admit that "the chief reliance for any substantial increase, and even for the prevention of any possible decrease, must be on internal duties." During the stress of war, not the customs, but internal duties increased the revenue by leaps and bounds and thereby saved the credit of the Nation. Following the war the same shifting, fluctuating revenue conditions continued. Strangely enough, we find a surplus of $100,000,000 in the Treasury in 1871–72. In the latter year much of the internal tax was repealed and the customs duties were reduced 10 per cent. Three years later we see the Government borrowing money and restoring the 10 per cent rate on customs duties. By 1879 the Government again had an embarrassing surplus, which climbed to $100,000,000 in 1886. But the year 1890 witnessed the coming of another deficit, which, on June 30, 1894, under the schedules of the McKinley tariff law, reached the huge amount of $69,000,000, the Government being again compelled to borrow money. After the Spanish-American war there was another rise in receipts, resulting in a surplus during 1907 of $111,000,000. But the scene suddenly shifts again, for in 1908 this tremendous surplus becomes transformed into a deficit of $20,000,000 and the Government is obliged to issue bonds in a time of peace.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of these plain lessons of experience, demonstrating the utter inadequacy of the indirect tax with its supplemental internal taxes as a basis for national revenue, how can the blindest adherent of this system longer deny the necessity for its immediate reform? No method of raising revenue is so unreliable as duties on imports, and none so difficult to raise or lower without seriously disturbing business. From the beginning of the Government our fiscal system has been a veritable seesaw—the Treasury plunged into a large deficit to-day, and groaning under a huge surplus to-morrow. Mr. Chairman, an income tax and economy in expenditures will secure and maintain an equilibrium between the Treasury's income and outgo.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. Chairman, in this discussion I neither extol the poor nor decry the rich. I oppose the unjust taxation of any class, be they rich or poor. I favor the application of those doctrines of revenue that know no class, that fall upon all in proportion to ability, and that conform to every ideal of justice in taxation. Our laws and governmental policies should recognize no distinction between the humble citizen on his pallet of straw and the rich man in his gilded palace. We should keep in mind that hymn of triumphant democracy:

> The rank is but the guinea stamp;
> The man's the gowd for a' that!

I make no assault upon wealth as such, but rather upon the evils of which certain classes of wealth are the willing and knowing beneficiaries. Wealth can not, however, shirk and shift its just responsibilities and burdens, and then, with a look of injured innocence, complain under the weight of legitimate criticism.

Mr. Chairman, I favor a reasonable income tax, not as a punishment to the wealthy, but as a bona fide means of equalizing tax burdens and raising adequate revenue. The income tax is not of ancient origin. The land tax was the first method of securing revenue. Later, when wealth became so extensive and varied, the tax upon general property was devised. Finally, at the instance of Pitt, an income tax found its way into the English revenue system in 1798 as a war emergency measure. It was repealed at the close of the Napoleonic wars. But in 1842, when the great fight for fiscal reform raged in England and the cry for cheaper bread resounded throughout the country, those patriotic champions of the rights of the poor—Bright, Peel, and Cobden—succeeded in abolishing the odious corn laws and the powerful protective-tariff system, then as firmly intrenched as it is in the United States to-day, and substituting an income tax in lieu thereof. It became thenceforth a permanent part of the English system of taxation. Its purpose has always been either one of revenue or a means of improving and equalizing general tax laws, or both. Most countries adopting this tax did so originally upon emergency grounds, but as a rule it has later been permanently retained in response to necessities created by modern industrial and financial conditions.

The States of North Carolina, Virginia, Alabama, and Massachusetts enacted income-tax laws with a view to correcting inequalities in their tax systems. But, like most personal-property tax laws, they have been largely ignored by both the taxgatherer and the taxpayer. Some leading economist has said that a state income-tax law has all the disadvantages of a national law and none of its advantages. Many of the larger incomes are derived from interstate businesses and are difficult, if not impossible, of collection by the States for lack of jurisdiction. During recent years most of the civilized countries, save France, Russia, Belgium, and the United States, have adopted and made this tax a permanent feature of their revenue systems; and France has a tax equivalent to it.

THIS TAX WORKS WELL IN BOTH THEORY AND PRACTICE.

Mr. Chairman, this tax, more nearly than any other, approaches the perfection of fiscal wisdom. None deny that it is absolutely sound in theory. Its practical application has now been demonstrated and is less controverted each succeeding year. It is in perfect harmony with the foundation principles of justice and equality upon which our Government was laid. Wise, simple, and effective, it would meet and cope with all the developments of our industrial and financial affairs. This doctrine embodies all the twentieth-century philosophy of taxation. The underlying basis of all sound systems of taxation is that each man should pay taxes in proportion to his means, real and personal. The income tax would oblige the citizen annually to contribute a fair and just proportion of his net gains to the maintenance of the Government.

An English court, in referring with approval to this tax, said:

> The object of a taxing act is to grant to the sovereign a revenue, and to raise it from those on whom it falls with as little trouble and annoyance, and as equally, as can be contrived.

Adam Smith, the father of political economy, said:

> The private revenue of individuals arises ultimately from three different sources—rent, profits, and wages. Every tax must finally be paid from some one or other of those three different sources of revenue or from all of them indifferently.

The income tax is the only method ever devised that squares with all four of Adam Smith's revenue maxims: It is equal; it is certain; it is paid at a time and in a manner most convenient to the taxpayer—when his income is received; and the cost of collection is trifling.

All the great political economists and other noted authorities on taxation lay down the doctrine that the citizens of a nation should pay taxes to the government according to their ability. Among these may be mentioned Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, Thiers, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Mirabeau, J. B. Say, Gernier, Sismondi, Bastable, and Ely. One of the ablest authorities says:

> The most modern and, theoretically, the fairest form of taxation is the income tax. It seems to make everyone contribute to the wants of the state in proportion to the revenue he enjoys under its protection. While falling equally on all, it occasions no change in the distribution of capital or in the material direction of industry and has no influence on prices. No other is so cheaply assessed or collected. No other brings home to the people so forcibly the fact that it is to their interests to insist upon a wise economy of the national revenue.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, under this law the people would see and know they were paying taxes, but they would also see and feel a great reduction in the prices of necessaries and other commodities, save those farm and other products whose prices are fairly and justly fixed in the world's market by the law of supply and demand; besides, the people would have the greatest incentive to carefully guard and scrutinize public expenditures and frown on extravagance. No, this tax does not affect the natural and legitimate distribution of capital as does our present customs system, which has for its end and effect "the enrichment of the privileged class by the systematic robbery of the masses, and it breeds an aristocracy of wealth which, as with every other aristocratic rule, must end in conflict." Neither, Mr. Chairman, does it occasion the slightest interference in industrial affairs as do changes in the tariff every few years.

ITS RATES EASILY CHANGED.

The rates of the income tax can easily be raised or lowered within a week's time, helping rather than hurting business, by reason of its stability. With this tax in operation we would not again behold the shameful scenes enacted here last summer—Congress struggling for five months to revise the tariff, lobbyists swarming like locusts through all the corridors of the Capitol, demanding their respective shares of protection's plunder, business at a standstill and in suspense awaiting the outcome, suffering a loss, if the Speaker of the House was accurately reported, of $10,000,000 a day. Nor would the operation of this tax influence prices when its rates are changed or at any other time, because it does not rest upon consumption, but upon the income of wealth.

ITS PRODUCTIVENESS.

Mr. Bastable, the leading English financier, said:

Production and a tolerable approach to just distribution are the two essentials of taxation.

The income tax is the very embodiment of these two essentials. Its revenues readily respond to changes in rates entailing no hardship upon anyone, and at the same time promptly bring relief to the government's finances, filling up a deficit or diminishing a surplus, as may be desired. If the taxpayer suffers a decline in his income his taxes are reduced in proportion; if his income increases his taxes increase proportionately. The wonderful flexibility and certain productiveness of this tax enables it to meet every requirement of peace or war emergencies, having thus proven in England, in the language of Gladstone, "an engine of gigantic power." During the great strain of national emergencies an income tax is absolutely without a rival as a relief measure. Many governments in time of war have invoked its prompt and certain aid. It enabled England to conquer Napoleon. It came to the relief of our depleted Treasury during the civil war, when the customs revenues were at a low ebb, and saved the rapidly sinking credit of the Nation. We can not expect always to be at peace. If this nation were tomorrow plunged into a war with a great commercial country from which we now receive a large portion of our imports, our customs revenues would inevitably decline and we would be helpless to prosecute that war or any other war of great magnitude without taxing the wealth of the country in the form of income.

IS IT AN UNJUST TAX?

Mr. Chairman, the apologists of the rich sometimes say that this method of taxation is unjust. The statement of this objection is its own refutation. Their doctrine seems to be that any kind of tax imposed on other classes is entirely just and proper, but that the slightest effort to require wealth to share the most reasonable and necessary tax should be loudly resented as injustice, socialism, and confiscation. In speaking of the then existing income tax in 1870, Senator John Sherman said it was "the most just and equitable tax that is now levied by the United States of America, without an exception," because it was the "only discrimination in our tax laws that will reach wealthy men as against the poorer classes of people," who still "necessarily pay nine-tenths of all the taxes." This utterance but echoed the sentiment of the real statesmanship and disinterested patriotism of that time.

In time of war forty-nine-fiftieths of those who volunteer to make up our great armies and navies upon which we must rely to fight our battles, defend our flag, gain our victories, and maintain Anglo-Saxon supremacy, are persons whose courage and patriotism are as great as their worldly possessions are small. This doctrine of untaxed wealth that the poorer classes should both pay the Nation's taxes and imperil life and limb fighting its battles is indeed hard and harsh. Is the Government to bestow upon these possessors of great fortunes all the blessings of a republic and at the same time exempt them from all its burdensome responsibilities? Is there to be no balance between the people of large means and those of small means in the imposition of tax obligations, either in times of peace or war? It is mildly claimed that this is effected by state and local taxation; but this is only true in a very minor degree.

WEALTH LARGELY EVADES STATE AND LOCAL TAXATION.

Personal property in the cities and towns almost entirely escapes state and municipal taxation, as does no little of it in the rural sections. But the farmer of moderate means can not hide his property nor shift his tax burdens; he constantly feels their crushing weight, while the rich investor in securities, the money lender, and the wealthy business and professional men cover up most of their taxable personality as well as much of their city realty when the assessor comes around. A report of the Census Office shows that for the year 1902, the assessed valuation of real property constituted 74$\frac{1}{10}$ per cent or three-fourths of the assessed valuation of all property. This same report shows that in the year of 1904 the true value of all property was $107,104,192,410; that the ad valorem assessment of this property was only $38,963,381,120; that the personalty assessment was only $8,873,562,448, although the true value of all personalty was $44,762,719,783—a 20 per cent assessment—while the assessment of realty was less than 50 per cent of its true value. The present mayor of New York during last week cited a number of instances of inadequate assessment and evasion which but illustrate tax conditions prevailing in most States, and especially cities throughout the country, as follows: One piece of real estate was assessed at $29,300, and was then mortgaged for $276,000, and was sold for $350,000. Another piece of real estate was down on the tax books at $1,078,300, and was sold for $4,565,367. The income tax secures more than a third as much again revenue from property as do our state and local tax systems.

INCOME TAX COMING INTO UNIVERSAL FAVOR.

Mr. Chairman, most all of the earlier systems of taxation have omitted any provision calculated to reach the income of property, but during the past generation a movement to tax incomes has started and is rapidly becoming world-wide. The aggregate wealth of the United States to-day is $120,000,000,000, and why should not a portion of the Government's revenues be derived from the earnings of this fabulous sum, most of which can not be reached in any other way, "instead of placing it all, or nearly all, on consumption—on the necessaries of life, which are consumed by all, but are not used in proportion to their ability to pay taxes, but according to the necessities of existence?" Will it be longer insisted by the spokesmen of privilege that expatriated "patriots" like William Waldorf Astor shall be privileged to continue their residence abroad while their landed and other estates, aggregating hundreds of millions in value, remain here under the protection of our Government without the payment of a farthing of revenue in return? Is it deemed wise and just to thus exempt from taxation the property of this class of persons, whether residing here or elsewhere, and at the same time impose such excessive tariff rates as compel the masses of the people, in addition to the payment of our federal taxes, annually to pay the United States steel trust $50,000,000 in excess of a reasonable net profit, and in like proportion the sugar trust, the smelters trust, the wool trust, the agricultural implement trust, and a hundred other trusts that are thus daily fattening upon the hard earnings of those who toil?

FALSE CHARGE OF SOCIALISM.

Mr. Chairman, as a last resort, the opponents of an income tax argue that it is socialistic and merely intended to secure a redistribution of property. This tax does not contemplate a redistribution of property, but a redistribution—an equitable distribution—of taxes, based upon ability to pay and more nearly approximating justice than any other that could be imposed. Unlike our present unequal tariff law, it is a tax upon plenty rather than necessity; and instead of seizing millions of the poor and humble and holding them in the grip of lasting poverty, it lightens their burdens and helps them to banish the fear of hunger, thirst, and cold.

This cry of socialism and confiscation is not worthy of refutation. It is but a repetition of that subterfuge that has done service so often when it has been sought to block reform and secure the retention of existing abuses. This false cry has been raised against every fight for real fiscal reform in all countries and ages. We often hear its echoes in the States and municipalities when an attempt is made to correct inequalities in their tax systems. This same wail was set up in England and America in opposition to an inheritance tax. A like method of objection was met by the proponents of the property tax in Germany and Holland; and this tax only strikes at the property owner, not the income receiver. In Great Britain, compulsory education, the post-office system, the factory laws, and most all other wholesome enactments hitting at vicious class evils or designed to keep pace with advancing social and industrial progress have been promptly characterized as socialism. If this tax is socialistic and confiscatory, then most all of the great governments of the earth have put socialism and confiscation into practical and permanent operation and effect.

Mr. Chairman, occasionally the suggestion has been advanced that this tax is un-American and undemocratic. But the fact that it first took root in the most democratic countries in the world, like the cantons of Switzerland, where it has been perfected and rounded into a model revenue tax, explodes this notion.

THIS TAX CONSTITUTIONAL AND WOULD BE SO HELD.

I have heretofore discussed the constitutionality of this tax, and I shall not do so again except to say that, from the decision in the Hylton case, in 1796, until the decision in the Pollock case, in 1894, the constitutionality of this tax was not seriously questioned. It was settled, and well settled. In five leading cases the doctrine was uniformly held that under the direct tax clause of the Constitution there are no direct taxes save a capitation or poll tax and a tax on land. At this late day it would be idle to speculate and quibble as to the views of the framers of the Constitution when they adopted the direct-tax clause. Political economy was then in its infancy. The term "direct" had no fixed, legal meaning, but was given various significations by writers on taxation. Hence, our government was left free to adopt such interpretation as sound wisdom suggested.

And as early as 1796 we see the Supreme Court, embracing two judges who were members of the Constitutional Convention, in the carriage-tax decision giving to the word "direct" an authoritative and conclusive construction, viz, that it embraced only capitation and land taxes. This construction was at once approved and adopted by the legislative and executive departments of the Government, and until 1894 has been consistently followed by all the courts, Congresses, Presidents, lawyers, and text-book writers; and, in the language of Mr. Justice White:

> By the repeated reiteration and affirmance of that interpretation has become imbedded in our jurisprudence, and therefore may be considered almost a part of the written Constitution itself.

By its action in the Pollock case—a five to four decision—the Supreme Court overturned all the judicial precedents of a century and placed its final veto upon the taxation of wealth. Wealth can only be reached successfully by the taxation of its income, and this can not be done by apportionment according to population. There were two hearings of this case, and two judges changed in opinion on the reargument. One of the Government's attorneys stated that—

> On the first hearing six out of eight judges held the law void as to so much of one's income as is derived from rentals, while four only of them held it void as a whole. On the second hearing, a ninth judge being present, one of the six, together with the new judge, concluded that it was valid as to the rentals, and valid also as a whole. One judge, however, who had voted against it on the rentals question alone, now concluded to vote against it as a whole, and the final poll stood, therefore, five to four on each question. The decision of the court on the first hearing found not a single supporter on the second.

In the language of Mr. Justice Harlan:

> In view of former adjudications, this decision may not improperly be regarded as a judicial revolution that may sow the seeds of hate and distrust among the people of different sections of our common country.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, there are those who pretend to think that it would be an "affront" to the court for Congress or any other human agency, by proper and orderly procedure, to ask the Supreme Court to again consider the questions decided adversely to the Government in the Pollock case. The President has even been accused of expressing this view in his recent Denver speech. Is it possible that he has been inveigled into the support of this doctrine? If true, this was the utterance of Mr. Taft, the politician, and not Mr. Taft, the President or the lawyer. This new and strange doctrine of judicial procedure, while conceding that it is right and proper for an individual suitor to ask the Supreme Court to reconsider a judgment believed to be unsound, teaches that it would result in a serious and unjustifiable "affront" and injury to the judiciary if 90,000,000 citizens or suitors, through their representatives in Congress, should ask this august tribunal to reconsider a five to four decision. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It can not be denied that this decision deprives Congress of the power to effectively tax wealth. Will a newly-constituted Supreme Court restore that taxing power to Congress, of which it was so erroneously deprived? Or will those two distinguished individuals from Rhode Island and Illinois, who now dominate the majority in Congress and stand between wealth and righteous taxation, allow Congress, by the passage of a new law, to give the court an opportunity to correct its mistake, now conceded by every unbiased lawyer in America?

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

This course was attempted by Congress last summer, but the friends of the income tax were thwarted by means of a legislative trick, sprung at the crucial hour by the enemies of this tax, but not until it became known that no other means would or could prevent the speedy enactment of a comprehensive income-tax law. This sinister undertaking succeeded.

The income tax was killed, and in lieu we have in part a proposed amendment that, to become effective, must be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. Of course the friends of this tax, when thus defeated in their effort to pass a new law, voted to submit the amendment to the States, though knowing at the time that it was chiefly in charge of the bitter opponents of income taxation and not offered in good faith by them. It is to be sincerely hoped that the requisite number of States will ratify the amendment, for it would forever quiet this controversy. Therefore, both remedies might properly be pursued at the same time. There is no occasion for conflict between these two remedies, but the tactics of the opposition have been that when either remedy was about to be adopted, to propose and urge the other in its stead, thereby hoping to permanently defeat and destroy this doctrine. I regret to see that the outcome of the proposed amendment is involved in grave doubt. The failure or refusal of either legislative branch in as many as 12 States, to concur in the proper resolution, would encompass the defeat of the amendment. Who is so ignorant or credulous as not to know the certain effects of the tremendous influence which powerful wealth exercises on many state political organizations, upon the press, and upon other mediums of manufacturing influence and sentiment? Who can expect, though one may hope, to see a majority of both houses of the legislative bodies of three-fourths of the States successfully combat the strong and corrupting influences of accumulated wealth and ratify this amendment? The American people are about to be flimflammed in this controversy. This great power of taxation, which was considered as immutable as the Constitution itself, was taken away from Congress by the action of one judge in changing both his mind and his vote. Congress having denied the Supreme Court an opportunity to do so, the question of its restoration is now left, not to a majority of the American people, but solely to the tender mercies of a few hundred individuals who may happen to constitute a majority of either of the two legislatives houses in 12 States; or, if this majority should be controlled by caucus action, then a majority of the majority would settle the fate of this amendment.

GOVERNOR HUGHES INTERPOSES HIS VETO.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the ratification of this amendment by the States, as is every real friend of the income tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However, I warn its friends to be on their guard, for the fight against this amendment will be made, is now being made, not by its open enemies, but by its pretended friends. This is notably illustrated by the action of Governor Hughes, of New York, who recently emerged from the penumbra of colossal wealth, which never pays a dollar of federal taxes, and constituted himself its spokesman long enough to proclaim an issue in this battle to perpetuate its immunity from taxation.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If I have time.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman mean to state that what Governor Hughes said in his special message was said for any other reason than that he believed that the interests of the State ought to be protected? Does he mean to say that Governor Hughes is engaged in a flimflam on the people or to convey that impression?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If the committee will allow me just three minutes time, I am approaching the very subject about which the gentleman inquires.

Mr. PARSONS. If the gentleman says any such thing as that, or intends to convey any such idea, I wish to state that he has no understanding of the character of Governor Hughes. He is a man who never has allowed any such influences to affect him in the least, and the gentleman may be sure that anything that he has done, he has done only because of the highest motives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is somewhat premature in anticipating something about which he knows nothing. I have not yet made the statement which I was about to make, and I think the gentleman will have ample opportunity, after I do, to rush to the defense of the gentleman, in whom he seems to have a great personal interest.

The governor could not content himself with a personal declaration against this amendment, as was his privilege, but so eager was he to throw himself between plutocracy and the people that he sent a lengthy message to his state legislature expressive of his so-called "official views" condemning the amendment; and in so doing he was guilty of an officious impertinence and a negligent disregard of the spirit of the Constitution. Its language is that an amendment shall be valid "when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States." The legislatures act alone, and in the capacity of a convention as distinguished from the exercise of a legislative power. The governor has no veto power and no function or duty authorized or imposed, save the purely ministerial one of transmitting the amendment to and from the legislature. Why did the governor rush to the center of the stage and thrust his individual views, under the guise of official duty, upon that body? He was throwing, without authority, the weight and prestige of his great office into this fight on the side of those who think it socialistic to tax wealth and the quintessence of fiscal wisdom to tax poverty. His action was that of an official intermeddler. To prevent a misconstruction of their attitude other governors may now feel obliged also to transmit their views to their respective legislatures.

Mr. Chairman, the New York governor charges that the proposed amendment authorizes the taxation of incomes from state and municipal bonds, and if adopted the tax, if levied, might cripple the borrowing capacity of the States and their local governments. This objection is unsupported by reason or experience. States and municipalities have no occasion, save in the rarest instances, to strain their credit. It would be difficult to conceive an emergency requiring expenditures approaching their taxing capacity or very far in excess of their ordinary and normal revenues. They do not bear the expense of war.

But the General Government must at times raise enormous revenues to meet great military and naval expenditures. And only the stress of war could endanger its credit. Yet, no matter how great its distress and pressing its needs during fierce conflict, Governor Hughes would deny the General Government—which then protects the States and municipalities—a reasonable contribution from several thousand rich and idle holders of state and municipal securities, notwithstanding only a minor portion of their income would be derived from this source. Yes; he would permanently defeat the entire income tax rather than permit the General Government to exercise this power even under the strain of a great war. If there be any efficacy in his contention, which I deny, he is strangely silent in the face of an existing condition far more dangerous. The bonds of any one State and its municipalities are at the mercy of the taxing power of the other 45 States and their municipalities. The Supreme Court has so held in 104 United States Reports, page 592. The distinguished governor would withhold from the General Government a taxing power that may be exercised with impunity by every State and municipality in the Union. As a rule, the holders of these State and other local securities are nonresidents of the State whose bonds they hold. In 1902 the total state, county, and municipal indebtedness comprised only $1,864,978,483 of the Nation's present total wealth of $120,000,000,000—only a fraction over 1 per cent and a ratio of less than 1 to 60. How much would a reasonable income tax, reaching all property alike, on an indebtedness of $1,000 affect the borrowing capacity of a citizen owning $60,000 of property? The total interest-bearing debt of the Nation November 1, 1909, was $913,317,490. Who, other than Governor Hughes and selfish wealth which he now serves, will dare to express the baseless fear that this amendment threatens the credit of our States and municipalities, when the Nation's wealth is sixty times as great as their indebtedness and more than forty times as great as our total national, state, and local indebtedness?

The States and their local governments will, as they properly should, easily resort to sufficient taxation to amply maintain their credit without serious burden to the taxpayer. Though straining at this gnat of state and municipal bond taxation, the governor gulps down with one swallow the camel of unlimited congressional power in other lines. Why were his fears not aroused by the existence of other powers vested in the General Government, immeasurably greater than the one he affects to dread? Will he contend that the unqualified power given Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States was a mistake and should have remained elsewhere? Will he deny that this power is an indispensable one, even though Congress could, in its exercise, stop and tie up every interstate common carrier in the Nation, destroy commerce, paralyze industry, and create commercial chaos? Will he insist that the sole power to impose duties on imports should not have been bestowed upon the General Government, even though Congress could, in its exercise, according to Republican teaching, block and shut out all imports from foreign countries? Will he complain because the Constitution gives the Nation the power concurrent with the States to tax persons and property directly, even though Congress could, in its exercise, tax every citizen to the point of impoverishment? Finally, will he become alarmed when he reflects that Congress is given power to tax persons and property without limitation—barring two qualifications and one exception? No; he views these with complacency.

Mr. Chairman, Members of Congress are more closely identified with the States and their municipalities than with the General Government, and they would be far from imposing any tax, as they have been heretofore, that might in the least interfere with the maintenance of all the functions of the former. No man believes more firmly in the doctrine of states rights than I do; but I despise the citizen who never invokes this sacred doctrine except as a shield for injustice. If Governor Hughes and those who accept his views are friends of the income tax, as they profess, then it has no enemies.

THE MODERNIZED TAX ELIMINATES PREVIOUS FAULTS.

Mr. Chairman, it is finally urged by those who oppose this tax that it is not entirely practical in its operation and effect, being inquisitorial and difficult of assessment and collection. That these objections are fallacious and have been exploded by the experience of great governments like Great Britain, Germany, Japan, Spain, Italy, Switzerland, Denmark, Hungary, the Netherlands, and Norway and Sweden must be admitted. The cry of "inquisitorial" is chiefly humbug and cant. It originated during the operation of the war income tax, the machinery for the assessment and collection of which was crude, antiquated, and faulty, and before the methods of enforcement had been developed and perfected as they are now; nevertheless, this complaint has been kept alive for lack of legitimate argument. Other nations in which it is enforced uniformly attest the fact that this tax is no more objectionable to the taxpayer than any other. I unhesitatingly assert that even our war income tax was freer from faults and frauds than our general property state tax systems are to-day. In a majority of the States the demand for a general readjustment of their respective tax systems on account of fraud, evasion, and inadequate revenue is loud and insistent. What is known as "collection at the source" is the root of the administration of an income-tax system as at present developed. More than two-thirds of England's $165,000,000 income-tax revenues is stopped and collected at the source so that the taxpayer never sees a revenue official. Congress could easily pass a new law modeled after the perfected systems of other countries—raising their exemptions and omitting their higher rates and more rigorous features—that would disarm the usual criticism. The now somewhat out-of-date assessment and collection machinery of the law of 1894 subjected it to much criticism that a new law would obviate. Save in two instances this law required compulsory declarations, or self-assessment, by the citizens—the Government retained the tax out of salaries and required corporations to withhold it from dividends.

Instead, the method of collection at the source, had it been then developed, could have been easily introduced to a large extent. It has been pointed out that the tax on all salaries could have been retained and reported by the employer. The corporations could have been required to withhold the interest on all corporate bonds. The income of real-estate mortgages could have been treated as a part of the real estate and requiring the mortgagor to withhold the interest. In many other effective ways this method of collection could have been introduced.

Mr. Chairman, two-thirds of a tax that would yield $150,000,000 of revenue in this country could be collected at the source, thus obviating any personal assessment and consequent charge of inquisitorialness. This large sum, while not burdening the wealth that would pay it, would enable Congress to speedily improve our rivers and harbors and our more than 1,000,000 miles of post-roads extending through every part of the country.

COMPARISON WITH PRESENT STATE AND NATIONAL SYSTEMS.

Mr. Chairman, I challenge a comparison of the methods of assessing and collecting this tax with those relating to both our state and national taxes. Spread a modernized income tax alongside of our present state and national tax laws—schedule by schedule, paragraph by paragraph, item by item—and in every important aspect the former will disclose virtues superior to the latter. The inquisitorial features of our state tax laws are most rigid; yet, the amount of realty, and especially personalty, that evades and escapes taxation is staggering to the average mind.

While the right of search and seizure pervades both our customs and internal-revenue system of national taxation, and the machinery of assessment and collection is necessarily intricate and exacting in a high degree; yet, with this boasted system there is more or less fraud and evasion in every custom-house and in every internal-revenue district. A conservative estimate places the Government's loss from the sugar-trust frauds alone at $30,000,000. Only the guilty culprits know its amount, in connection with numerous other frauds and evasions being constantly practiced at the expense of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, dishonest persons have no right to complain of laws designed to detect dishonesty. What right have honest men to complain of such laws? The sole opposition to this doctrine comes from those who have the ability to pay taxes, but who have shirked their just share and who seek to avoid the payment of all taxes.

COST OF COLLECTION.

The cost of collecting this tax is less than that of any other tax. The experience of all countries imposing it might be cited in evidence. The cost has uniformly been less than 2 per cent. With such a law in operation now, its expense of collection would be almost nominal. The present internal-revenue force would only need to be slightly enlarged to insure the certain and easy collection of this tax. The expense of collecting our internal revenue for 1908 was 1.84 per cent, but the average cost during the past forty years has been over 3 per cent. The cost of collecting the customs revenue for the year 1908 was 3.35 per cent; but the average cost during the past forty years has been over 4 per cent.

AN IDEAL INCOME-TAX LAW.

Mr. Chairman, a comprehensive and perfect income-tax law would be a graduated one imposing rates on a progressive scale, the lowest resting on incomes just above those necessary for the easy and comfortable maintenance of an average family, and higher rates applying to each successive category of higher income. But in view of those features of our present state and national taxation that will, and should, be permanently retained, as well as our moderate revenue necessities when compared with our tax resources, I should at present favor a tax on the higher incomes only, say those above $3,500, with a differentiation between earned and unearned income, prescribing a lower rate for the former; and whenever deemed advisable, a reasonable super tax on incomes over $25,000 would make the graduation more complete and fair. I adopt this view because further graduation would require direct personal assessment and prevent the use of the system of collection at the source. The super tax, however, would be levied by personal assessment.

The chief burden of our present indirect taxation falls upon people having incomes of $1,200 to $2,000, and under. It is safe to say that seven-eighths of our customs taxes amounting to more than $300,000,000 annually, are paid by the people whose income does not exceed $2,000. Where would be the injustice in requiring the more than 750,000 persons with incomes of $3,500 and upward to contribute $150,000,000 annually to the Government's revenue? There are no local statistics available for estimating the number of income-tax payers, their taxable incomes, and net revenue to be derived from this tax in the United States. However, an estimate can be made with some degree of approximation by comparison of population and wealth with that of the United Kingdom, and applying the figures revealed by the operation of this tax in the latter country.

In 1906 it was agreed that the distribution of income in that country was as follows: Persons with incomes of $3,500 per annum and upward and their families (275,000×5)—1,375,000 and the annual income £585,000,000; persons with incomes between $800 (£160) and $3,500 (£700) per annum and their families (750,000×5)—3,750,000 and the annual income £245,000,000; persons with incomes less than $800 (£160) per annum and their families, 37,875,000, and the annual income £880,000,000—thus revealing a total population of 43,000,000 and an aggregate annual income of £1,710,000,000, or $8,550,000,000. By comparison with this showing it is easily concluded that we have in this country more than 750,000 persons having incomes of $3,500 and upward and with an aggregate annual income of more than $7,000,000,000. The amount of federal taxes paid by this class is almost nominal, although their annual income is nearly one-half—more than one-third—of that of the whole number of people, while, in common with all others, they only pay state and local taxes on 20 per cent of their personalty and on less than 50 per cent of their realty. Upon what theory can they longer claim exemption from federal taxation?

Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to offer a detailed statement of the income-tax systems in other countries, because I am to-day printing in the RECORD synopses of these systems in 17 foreign governments, which are sufficiently explanatory.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I reiterate my abiding faith in this tax, notwithstanding its bare mention arouses the fear and amazement of untaxed wealth. The cry of "class legislation" has no terrors for me so long as it comes from the creatures of class legislation. I favor it because it logically goes hand in hand with tariff reform. I believe in it because it is not the handmaiden of trusts and is not a tax upon the means of life. My consideration for honest wealth engaged in legitimate industry is as great as my respect for idle, ill-gotten fortunes that refuse to pay taxes is small. Mr. Chairman, this country is approaching a tax revolution. The defenders of privilege, so long triumphant, can not turn back the tide of fiscal reform. Their opposition is a challenge to the civilization and representative government of our twentieth century. Is our present hideous, monstrous system of taxation to go down in history as the culmination of centuries of Anglo-Saxon legislation? No! Some Pitt or Cobden will rise up and engage its champions in a battle to the death. And their ardent followers will constitute the best manhood and patriotism of this country, the type of citizenship that wrought out this Government, that has safely guided it through the trials and vicissitudes of more than one hundred years, that has been its mainstay in the past and will be its glory in the future. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The following are the documents respecting the income-tax systems of foreign countries referred to in the remarks of Mr. HULL of Tennessee:

INCOME-TAX SYSTEM OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The United Kingdom.

There exists an income tax for England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. Most all of the colonies of Great Britain likewise have separate income-tax systems, among which may be mentioned Canada, the colonies in India, Australia, and subordinate governments.

England proper derives more than one-fourth of her tax revenue from the income tax, being a larger proportion than that derived by any other country, Italy coming next, with more than one-sixth of its revenue derived from this tax. The doctrine of the income tax has reached its highest state of development in England proper. It was first adopted as a war measure in 1798, was repealed about 1815; was readopted upon a more extensive scale in 1842, being substituted for the corn laws and the protective system, and has since remained a fixed and permanent part of the English revenue system.

The system of assessment lies at the root of British income-tax administration. Thus it is extremely difficult for anyone whose income is derived, for example, from government stock or public companies, or from the rent of land and houses, to escape payment of the tax in full. The tax is stopped before it reaches his hands. Something like four-fifths of the income tax now brought into account is either assessed at the source or subjected to other satisfactory methods of verification. The large and rapid conversion of private businesses into public companies has greatly extended the system of collection at the source so that only incomes derived from private business, professions, and from abroad require self-assessment by the taxpayer. More than two-thirds of England's $165,000,000 annually derived from this tax is assessed and collected at the source, so that the taxpayer never sees a revenue or assessment official.

In 1906 a commission composed of members of the English Parliament, after an extended investigation, in its report upon the operation of this act states as follows: "The feeling formerly entertained against the income-tax system as inquisitorial and oppressive has, we believe, largely died away. The impartiality and secrecy of the local commissioners deserve and obtain public confidence in a high degree." It is also provided that any taxpayer can altogether avoid disclosure of his affairs to his neighbors by electing to be assessed by the special commissioners.

The income tax is imposed each year by parliamentary act and is granted only for a year. The period of time included in the income-tax year commences on April 6 and ends on April 5 the following year. The tax is, however, made payable on January 1 in the financial year. There is a time limit of one year for claiming duty in case of omission to assess, also a time limit of four months for increasing assessment on ground of omission or inadequate return, also a time limit of one and two years for enforcing penalties for defective returns, also a time limit of four months in case of executors.

The income-tax act of 1842 and the income-tax act of 1853, as modified by repeals and amendments contained in subsequent finance acts, prescribed the persons and sources of income to be taxed; created an administrative body, called "commissioners," for carrying out the purposes of the act; and, under the heads of "Rules" and "Cases," prescribed certain artificial rules as the basis of assessment of incomes from different sources. The mode in which the tax is to be assessed, levied, and collected is prescribed by the taxes-management act, 1880, and supplemental act of 1890. The administrative code would come to an end with each income-tax year were it not that each finance act revives and keeps in force the several existing acts, so as to make them apply to the new tax granted.

The aim of the income-tax acts is to bring within their meshes all net profits from (a) all property situate in the United Kingdom, (b) all trades and undertakings carried on actually or constructively within the United Kingdom; and (c) from all sources, whether within or without the Kingdom, received in the Kingdom by a person resident there. The income-tax act, 1803, on which are based the acts now in force, split the tax into five parts or schedules, viz: A, the tax on owners of real estate; B, the tax on farmers; C, the tax on profits from any public revenue; E, the tax on offices, pensions, and stipends; and D, which was intended to sweep in everything left, and the two branches to include, first, persons residing in Great Britain who were charged upon income from property situate in Great Britain or elsewhere, or from any profession, trade, or vocation carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere; and, secondly, nonresidents in Great Britain, who were only to be charged in respect of income arising in Great Britain. The five schedules above named undertake to embrace for taxation every kind of property enumerated under each head, and to impose thereon a duty of 20 shillings of the annual value thereof, but no duty is to be charged of a lower denomination than 1 penny. In classifying property for taxation under these different schedules, the sole purpose is to reach the taxpayer's income or annual profits, and the taxpayer is not to be charged twice over in respect of the same profit under different schedules. The cardinal idea of the income-tax acts is that a man should only be taxed in respect of his net income. "Annual value" is a term adopted to designate the basis of taxation of incomes. Certain rules for the ascertainment of this value have been prescribed. With respect to land, the annual value shall be understood to be the rent by the year at which the same are let at rack-rent, (a) if such rent shall have been fixed by agreement; (b) commencing within the period of seven years preceding April 5 next before the time of making the assessment. But if the same are not so let at rack-rent, then the annual value shall be the rack-rent at which the same are worth to be let by the year. There are certain qualifications to this rule governed by the rent contract. There are some distinctions made in the law and regulations governing the assessments of real estate in both Ireland and Scotland. There are also rules for assessment where the annual value is not otherwise ascertainable.

EXEMPTION.

In addition to charities, friendly societies, and similar bodies which have absolute or qualified exemptions, a person whose income does not exceed £160 is absolutely exempt from income tax.

ABATEMENT.

A man whose income does not exceed £700 is entitled to relief against income tax on a sliding scale.

The tax under schedule D is subdivided under six heads called "cases." The profits under cases 1, 2, and 5 are charged upon an average of three years, the profits under the others upon the amount received during the year. There are certain rules for the assessment and collection of the annual net earnings or incomes of every occupation deriving profits from land, including quarries, mines, wells, etc. In ascertaining the annual profits of land or occupations connected with it, certain deductions and allowances are permitted under schedule A, such as repairs, taxes, wear and tear, operating expenses, etc., the laws and regulations fixing same in detail. Allowances are made to colleges and universities, hospitals, almshouses, literary and scientific institutions, land used for charitable purposes, friendly societies, public schools, trade unions, etc.

Under schedule B, in determining the annual value for the purpose os assessment, the measure of charge is one-third the rent or annual value, that being the presumed profit of the farmer from his farming operation.

Real estate income tax is paid by the occupier; that is, the person in actual possession of the property, as far as the property is capable of occupation, or, in other words, the person having the use of the real estate. The result is that the occupier or the renter, as is usually the case, pays the income tax of land and deducts it from his rent. So universal is this practice that the landlord must make a written request, within a certain time, if he would have the tax assessed against him for payment by him in person. The law even authorizes the occupier of land to pay income tax. It thus appears that the tax levies are generaly made upon the occupier of real estate, who as a rule is a renter. Regulations are in effect safeguarding the tax in case of tenants vacating land they occupy for any cause.

Under Schedule A the profits arising from canals, inland navigations, streams of water, or from any railways or other ways of a public nature and belonging to or vested in any company of proprietors or trustees, whether corporate or not corporate, may be stated in one account and charged in the city, town, or place at or nearest the place where the general accounts of the concern are usually made up.

SCHEDULE C.

The duties under this schedule are charges upon income from public revenue, and the authorities through whose hands the income passes are required to deduct the tax. The assessment in the case of income derived from the imperial revenue is made by commissioners for the purpose, who act upon the information disclosed to them by the official sources of knowledge in their possession. These commissioners are the Bank of England, the Bank of Ireland, and other institutions which pay large annuities, dividends, shares, both foreign and colonial, to individuals, companies, and corporations. All banks thus intrusted with the settlement of taxes are expressly authorized to retain the tax, and this is considered payment by the person from whom the tax is due.

EXEMPTIONS UNDER THIS SCHEDULE.

There are numerous exemptions under this schedule, including the stock of friendly societies, the stock of savings banks, under certain conditions, stock of charitable institutions, places of worship, stock belonging to the sovereign, stock of industrial and provident societies, stock of trade-union provident funds, etc.

TAX UNDER SCHEDULE D.

This schedule is now the most productive source of revenue and was designed to include all sources of income not comprised in any of the other schedules. The schedule classifies the profits to be taxed under three heads, the first two having reference to the residences of the persons to be taxed. And in connection therewith are to be carefully considered the following three phrases used in the schedule, namely: (1) "Residing in the United Kingdom," as to the person; (2) "exercised within the United Kingdom," as to the trade or vocation; (3) "profits or gains," as to the taxable income.

The profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D are classified with reference to the sources from which they are derived into what are termed six cases, with special rules for ascertaining the duties payable in each particular case, some rules being common to more than one case. The cases divide the sources of income thus: (1) Profits of trade; (2) profits of profession; (3) profits of uncertain annual value; (4) foreign securities; (5) foreign possessions; (6) profits not otherwise charged. Certain deductions and abatements are allowed in each of the first and second cases, such as repairs, wear and tear of machinery and plant, bad debts, loss arising out of the trade, two-thirds of rent of residence, losses on other trades where a taxpayer carries on two or more distinct trades, necessary expenses of clergymen, life insurance premiums, deferred annuities, etc. The rule applicable to the two preceding cases is that the computation of duty or tax in respect of trade or profession, etc., shall be made exclusive of the profits or gains arising from lands, etc., occupied for the purpose of such trade or profession.

The third case embraces profits from interest out of public revenue, discounts, interest not annual, duty on dealers in cattle and milk, annuities and other yearly interests, interests secured on rates. The exemptions under this case embrace charities, friendly societies, savings banks, and trade unions.

The fourth case deals with interest arising from securities in the British plantations in America, or in other of His Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom, and foreign stock or security, except annuities arising from a public revenue directed to be charged under Schedule C.

The fifth case deals with possessions—that is, everything a person has as a source of income in the British plantations of America or in any other of His Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom and foreign possessions.

The sixth case undertakes to reach any and all annual profits or gains not following under any of the foregoing rules and not charged by virtue of any other schedule in the act.

The duties under Schedule D are assessed in part by each of the following, namely: Bank of England, Bank of Ireland, special commissioners, persons intrusted with payment of interest, etc.

The duties under Schedule D, which means taxes, are charged annually on and paid by the person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, fraternities, fellowships, companies, or societies, whether corporate or not corporate, receiving or entitled unto the profits, his, her, or their executors, administrators, successors, and assigns, respectively.

SCHEDULE E.

The income chargeable under this schedule applies to every public office or employment of profit and upon every annuity, pension, or stipend paid by His Majesty or out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom, except annuities charged to the duties under Schedule C. The tax is annually charged on all salaries, fees, etc., or profits whatever accruing by reason of such offices, employments, or pensions, the assessment to be in force for one year and levied for such year without any new assessment. Certain deductions are allowed, such as traveling expenses, life insurance, etc.

The taxes under this schedule are assessed by a set of commissioners. The list and method of making deductions under the various schedules involves a lengthy statement, which can not be made here.

As heretofore stated, every person is entitled to an exemption of income under £160. Certain relief in the way of abatement is had where income does not exceed £700; for instance, where the income exceeds £160, but does not exceed £700, the taxpayer shall be entitled to relief from income tax equal, (a) if his total income does not exceed £400, to the amount of the income tax upon £160; and (b) if his total income exceeds £400 and does not exceed £500, to the amount of the income tax upon £150; and (c) if his total income exceeds £500 and does not exceed £600, to the amount of the income tax upon £120; and (d) if his total income exceeds £600 and does not exceed £700, to the amount of the income tax upon £70; and such relief shall be given either by reduction of the assessment or by repayment of the excess which has been paid, or by both of those means, as the case may require.

Certain well-defined remedies are open for the establishment of claims for abatement or exemption.

A declaration, statement, or return of every source of every person's income chargeable under the income-tax act according to the respective schedule is required to be made by the proper persons, which in some cases is the person chargeable with the tax; in others, persons receiving money for others, agents of persons under disability or resident abroad, officers of corporations, etc. Suitable penalties for default in making returns are imposed. Where there is default in making these returns, the assessor makes the assessment according to his best information and judgment.

Adequate remedies are prescribed, both by appeal and otherwise, for the correction or suitable modification of any and every portion of the assessments, both in favor of the Government and the taxpayer, including also the right of appeal.

Unlike other income taxes, the income tax on railway is paid by quarterly installments on or before the 20th days of June, September, December, and March in each year for the first, second, third, and fourth installments, respectively. The total number of income-tax payers, under this law, is about 1,100,000 people, with an income of nearly £700,000,000. Abatements are allowed on the incomes of about 700,000 people—this being the number whose income is over £160 and under £700—with a total income of about £250,000,000.

The operation of the income tax shows that nearly one-half of the entire income of the United Kingdom is enjoyed by one-ninth of its population. This law's operation also shows that more than one-third of the entire income of the United Kingdom is enjoyed by less than one-thirtieth of its population.

In 1904 the number of persons with incomes of £700 and upward, and their families, was 1,375,000, computing five to the family, including the taxpayer; and their annual income was £585,000,000. The number of persons with incomes between £160 and £700 per annum, and their families, was 3,750,000, and their annual income for 1904 was £245,000,000. While persons with incomes of less than £160 per annum, and their families, numbered 37,875,000, and their income for the same year was £880,000,000. Thus making the aggregate number of persons 43,000,000, and their annual income aggregate £1,710,000,000. In 1904 the number of income-tax payers in London was 58,600; and rest of England and Wales 178,300; in Scotland, 25,400; in Ireland, 9,000. The yield of the income tax in Scotland is about one-tenth of the yield in England, while the yield in Ireland is about one-third of the yield in Scotland.

Japan.

LEGISLATION.

The system of income taxation now in force in Japan was established in 1899. The income-tax law governing it, together with the regulations for the enforcement thereof, are inclosed herewith. The rates of taxation thereunder were increased in 1904 and 1905 by the enactment and revision, respectively, of the extraordinary special tax law, of which a copy is also submitted herewith.

APPLICATION OF THE LAW.

The income tax is imposed upon (a) persons who are domiciled or have resided for at least one year in places within the Empire where the income-tax law is in force, and (b) persons who, though not domiciled or residing within the Empire, have property or are engaged in trade or business or receive interest from public bonds or company debentures in places where the law is in force. In the latter case, however, they are liable to pay the tax only on incomes derived from the sources mentioned. (See law, articles 1–2.)

CLASSES AND RATES OF TAXATION.

The classes and rates of income taxes are as follows:

	Ordinary rates.	Additional rates under extraordinary special tax law.[a]
CLASS 1.
Taxes on incomes of juridical persons:
A. Joint stock companies or joint stock partnerships organized with at least 21 shareholders or shareholder partners	Per cent. 2.5	Per cent of ordinary rate. 15
B. Other juridical persons with incomes under—
5,000 yen ($2,500)	2.5	8
10,000 yen ($5,000)	2.5	9
15,000 yen ($7,500)	2.5	10
20,000 yen ($10,000)	2.5	12
30,000 yen ($15,000)	2.5	17
50,000 yen ($25,000)	2.5	23
100,000 yen ($50,000)	2.5	30
100,000 yen upward	2.5	40
CLASS 2.
Taxes on interest on public-loan bonds or company debentures payable in places where the income-tax law is in force	2.0	None.
CLASS 3.
Taxes on incomes not included in the two preceding classes:
Not less than—
100,000 yen ($50,000)	5.5	27
50,000 yen ($25,000)	5.0	24
30,000 yen ($15,000)	4.5	21
20,000 yen ($10,000)	4.0	19
15,000 yen ($7,500)	3.5	17
10,000 yen ($5,000)	3.0	15
5,000 yen ($2,500)	2.5	14
3,000 yen ($1,500)	2.0	13
2,000 yen ($1,000)	1.7	13
1,000 yen ($500)	1.5	13
500 yen ($250)	1.2	11
300 yen ($150)	1.0	10

[a] The ordinary rates are those provided by the original income-tax law. The additional rates mentioned under classes 1 and 3 are those provided by the extraordinary special tax law already referred to, enacted in 1904 and revised in 1905 to meet the extra burden imposed on the national exchequer by the war. Although these and other taxes created by this law were to be abolished after the restoration of peace, they were made permanent by the post-bellum financial scheme adopted by the Twenty-second Diet, in 1906.

Incomes under class 3 of less than 300 yen ($150) are not taxed. If, however, the combined incomes of the head of a family and the members thereof who live with him, or of the members of a family who live in the same house apart from the head, total 300 yen or more, the tax is imposed at the specified rates on the total (see income-tax law, article 3, and extraordinary special tax law, article 2, item 3), even though the separate incomes fall below that amount. The minimum limit of income on which the tax is imposed appears extremely small, and is accounted for by the comparatively low standard of incomes prevailing in Japan.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

The following forms of income are exempt from taxation:

a. Salaries of officers and privates of the army and navy while engaged in war;

b. Allowances to widows and orphans, and pensions to the sick and wounded;

c. Money received for traveling or school expenses, and legal allowances received for support;

d. Incomes of juridical persons whose business is not conducted for profit;

e. Occasional incomes not derived from undertakings conducted for profit;

f. Incomes derived from property or from a trade, business, or profession in foreign countries or in places where the income-tax law is not in force, excepting the incomes of juridical persons whose head offices are located in a place where the law is in force;

g. Dividends and bonuses receivable from a juridical person on whom the income tax is imposed.

Complete exemption from the income tax is also granted to interest on savings debentures issued in accordance with the savings-debentures law of 1904, as well as to interest on public-loan bonds issued for the defrayment of extraordinary war expenses. All other national bonds, moreover, which were formerly subject to the income tax in the same manner as prefectural, municipal, or other public bonds, were entirely relieved thereof by an imperial ordinance approved by the Twenty-fifth Diet, promulgated on March 20 and carried into effect on April 1, 1909. These three cases constitute exceptions to the taxation of incomes of class 2 and limit the taxable incomes thereunder to the interest on public bonds other than national ones and company debentures payable in places where the income-tax law is in force. Interest on bonds and debentures, payable in places where the law is not in force, falls under incomes of class 3.

The Japanese system of taxation is seen to observe the principle of graduation partly in the case of incomes of juridical persons and entirely in that of the incomes of natural persons. In the former, however, the principle was not adopted in the original income-tax law, but in the extraordinary special tax law on account of special demands and in application only to the incomes of smaller companies and corporations. The system is also observed to provide for the exemption of certain classes of incomes. No differentiation is made between "earned" and "unearned" incomes, except in the special provision under class 2 for the imposition of a permanent tax of 2 per cent on interest received from public bonds and company debentures. This rate is lower than the average rate levied on other forms of income and is intended to facilitate the flotation of loans and to encourage the initiation and extension of industrial enterprises by relieving the interest on bonds and debentures of the heavier burden placed on other incomes. The same motive is probably responsible for the taxation of the incomes of juridical persons at a lower average rate than those of natural persons. (Inheritance taxes are not in force in Japan.)

SYSTEM OF ASSESSMENT.

The Japanese system provides for the assessment of the tax on direct returns by the individual taxpayer of his income from all sources. The returns and assessments are made, in some cases, on the actual income of the preceding year; in others, on the estimated income of the current year; and in still others, on an average of years. The methods of assessment under each class of income may be briefly described as follows:

1. For incomes under class 1 the total losses for the business year, the balance brought forward from the preceding year, and the amount reserved to meet liabilities for insurance are deducted from the actual gross profits of the year in question. In the case of incomes of persons not domiciled or residing within the Empire, however, only such profits and losses are calculated as accrue from the property, trade, or business located or carried on in places within the Empire where the income-tax law is in force.

2. For incomes under class 2 the payment due is taken.

3. For incomes under class 3 the estimated annual amount remaining after deducting necessary expenditures from total receipts is taken. (The deduction includes only expenes necessary for earning the income, and not household expenses.) To this provision, however, there are the following exceptions, in which the estimated total annual receipts are taken: (a) Interest on public-loan bonds and company debentures which is not paid in places where the income-tax law is in force; (b) interest on money loaned or deposited otherwise than in the course of business; and (c) dividends, salaries, wages, special allowances, annual allowances, annuities, and pensions received from juridical persons on whom the income tax is not levied.

Incomes accruing from agricultural lands are calculated upon the average of incomes for the three preceding years. (See income-tax law, article 4.)

ORGANIZATION AND PROCEDURE OF ASSESSMENT AND COLLECTION OFFICES.

The assessment and collection of income taxes are conducted by the general taxation offices of the department of finance. These offices are assisted in the case of taxes belonging to class 3 by income investigation committees, whose members are elected by the income taxpayers of the district concerned. The elections are supervised by the chiefs of the taxation offices. The members serve for four years, half their number being reelected every two years. They receive no regular salaries, but are entitled to special allowances and traveling expenses. The officials of the taxation offices it need hardly be said receive fixed stipends. (The percentage cost of collection of the income tax can not be given, owing to the combination of the collection of this tax with that of others.

The amounts of incomes under class 1 are determined by the taxation offices in accordance with the statements of profit and loss which juridical persons liable to the income tax must submit within seven days after the ordinary general meeting of each business year.

The amounts of incomes under class 3 are determined by the taxation offices in accordance with reports submitted by the income investigation committees. If, however, a committee is not constituted before August 30 of the year in question the taxation office determines the amount independently, and if its investigation is not completed within twenty-five days from its constitution the taxation office determines the remaining amounts of incomes independently. Moreover, a taxation office may demand a reinvestigation, and if the results thereof are deemed improper or the work is not completed within seven days the taxation office may in this case also make an independent determination. (See income-tax law, articles 7 to 35, and regulations thereunder, articles 3 to 13.)

APPEALS.

Appeals are provided for only in the case of incomes belonging to class 3, since the determination of the incomes of juridical persons is based on their own annual reports, while the interest on bonds or debentures is a matter of official record.

If a taxpayer of class 3, therefore, objects to the amount of income determined by the taxation office, he may, within twenty days from the receipts of information thereof, apply through the chief of the taxation office to the director of the revenue superintending bureau concerned for an inquiry. (A revenue superintending bureau covers a larger jurisdiction than a taxation office, and instructs and controls the taxation offices therein. The former collect only national taxes, whereas the latter collect local as well as national.) The inquiry is conducted by a permanent committee of inquiry, subject to the control of the revenue superintending bureau, and consisting of three tax collectors appointed by the minister of finance and four members of the investigation committee. Pending the decision of the committee, however, the applicant must pay the tax in accordance with the amount of income determined by the taxation office.

A person who is dissatisfied with the decision of a committee of inquiry may present a petition to the local authorities or bring an action in the administrative court. (See law, articles 36 to 39, and regulations, articles 15 to 29.)

PAYMENT OF TAX AT PLACES OTHER THAN DOMICILE OR RESIDENCE.

If a person does not reside in the places where the tax is to be paid, he must appoint a trustee to whom the management of matters relating to the payment of the tax shall be intrusted, and must report the appointment to the taxation office.

A person who has neither domicile nor residence in a place where the income-tax law is in force must report to the Government where his tax will be paid, and in the absence of such a report the Government will determine the place of payment. (See income-tax law, articles 44 and 45.)

PENALTIES.

A person who evades the payment of the tax by concealing the amount of his income is liable to a fine amounting to three times the tax evaded. However, if such a person voluntarily confesses his evasion, he is absolved from punishment and is made to pay only the tax actually due. No other penalties are attached, and no special provision appears to be made for the detection of fraudulent returns, other than that already described. (See law, article 46.)

STATISTICS.

The total yield of the income tax for the fiscal year 1907–8 was 27,391,303.51 yen ($13,696,651.75), while the total yield of all taxes for the same period was 316,609,273.69 yen ($158,304,636.84). The total amount of revenue for the same fiscal year was 635,904,186 yen ($317,952,093). The income tax therefore constituted about 9.5 per cent of the total taxes and about 4.3 per cent of the total revenue for the year.

The number of income-tax payers of class 3 at the beginning of the fiscal year 1907–8 was 917,079. The exact number of persons in the families represented by them is unknown, owing to the lack of special statistics; but the number is estimated at about 5,000,000, calculating on the basis of 5.5 as the average constituency of a family according to the latest census. The taxpayers, therefore, represent about 1.9 per cent and their families about 10.4 per cent of the total population, which by the census of 1906–7 was placed at 48,533,000. The number of juridicial persons paying the income tax (class 1) in 1907–8 was 6,374, while the number of those paying the tax on public bonds or debentures (class 3) is unknown.

Hungary.

With the statutes v.–x. v. j., 1909, the Hungarian legislation has created a fiscal reform which extends to the whole Hungarian system of taxation. The main idea of which reform is, on the one hand, the insuring as far as possible of the present income obtained by the direct taxes (200,000,000 Kronen), and on the other hand the better distribution of the burden of taxes on the taxpayers. The new reform retained the already existing "proceeds duties" (Ertragssteuern) in a modified form, and at the same time, in place of the supplementary income tax (Einkommensteuerzusching) which was imposed after the main taxes had been paid, and in different ways, according to the kind of tax, introduced the various standards of personal-income tax, leaving a minimum of subsistence tax free as a supplement and equalization.

Apart from several taxes, which although regarded as direct taxes according to the state estimates, are nevertheless theoretically not counted as direct taxes, the Hungarian system of direct taxation now consists of the following taxes: 1, ground tax; 2, house tax; 3, capital, interest, and annuities of all descriptions; 4, "produce duty" (Erwerbssteuer) for such business enterprises as are liable to inspection by the public auditor; 5, the general "produce duty" (Erwerbssteuer); 6, the income tax.

The ground and house taxes affect immovable estate in the same way as the duties on capital, interest, and annuities (Renten), as also the "produce duty" (Erwerbssteuer) on business enterprises liable to inspection by the public auditor affect the profits of floating capital and annuities, while finally the general "produce duties" (Erwerbssteuern) affect the results of every profitable employment, except the income of persons in service, such income being only liable to payment of income tax.

The reform of the system of taxation winds up with the personal income tax, according to which the total and combined personal income of every individual, no matter from what sources it may arise and without any reference to its origin, is liable to a tax. This last new arrangement is partly compensatory, partly additional. Additional because it implies a new burden on such parts of the income as are already liable to "proceeds duty" (Ertragssteuern)—that is, the duties on property, real or personal, settled or not settled (Whitaker.); and compensatory because it aims at the contingent inequalities of the taxes. On the other hand, taxes will be imposed on such parts of the income as remained over from the duties on "property, real or personal," etc., salaries and wages (Dienstbezüge), and that part of the income not liable to the "proceeds duty" (Ertrakssteuer) and accounted tax free.

As regards the different kinds of taxes, every piece of ground which can be cultivated for agricultural and other similar purposes (wirtschaftlich kultivierbare Grundstücke) is liable to ground tax, so far as the piece of land is not tax free. The ground tax is based on the "cadastral" net profits of the piece of ground in question, and is calculated in accordance with the law VII, v. j., 1875, in the different parts of the country and further, also, in accordance to the different branches of cultivation and standard of quality.

The new ground tax does not require the drawing up of a new taxation "cadastre," but only requires, first, the necessary revision of the existing public-land register; secondly, the carrying into execution all such alterations of a permanent character as have taken place in the different branches of agriculture; and, thirdly, the correction of the errors made while determining the different standards of quality and while making the necessary entries.

The ground tax is fixed at 20 per cent of the registral net profits, and the main amount of the registral net profits is fixed at 370,000,000 kronen.

Regarding the house taxes the annual value of the houses forms the basis of taxation. The actual value (Nutzwert) is calculated either according to the rent actually paid or according to the classification of the number of dwellings. Accordingly Hungarian law recognizes two kinds of house taxes—the house-rent tax and the graduated house tax (Hausklassensteuer). The following are liable to house-rent taxes: All rooms, dwellings, etc., that are let; and further, in those parishes and such districts where at least half of the dwellings are let, all such other parts of the dwelling as are not let are subject to a tax, the value of the rent being calculated by comparison. The amount of the "standard" (Schlüssel) for the house-rent tax varies in different parishes from 9 to 16 per cent of the gross amount of the profit obtained by renting houses. The amount of the graduated house tax is divided into three gradations, according to the number of the dwellings, rooms, etc., let in that individual parish, according to the character of the parish. The following are liable to the duties on capital, interest, and annuities (Renten): All such forms of interest or annuity as have their source within the sphere of the Kingdom of Hungary; further, the rents paid for such rights as are not liable to ground or house taxes. The standard of taxation generally amounts to 5 per cent of the gross profits of the object to be taxed; on annuities from relatives and on officers' marriage securities it amounts to 2 per cent.

The net profits of trade unions, associations, and limited-liability companies are liable to "produce duty" as well as those business undertakings liable to inspection by the public auditor. The rate or standard of taxation generally amounts to 10 per cent. By business undertakings exclusively dealing with industrial production or with coal mining it is 7 per cent. For other mining enterprises and certain agricultural and industrial unions in need of special protection it is 5 per cent.

The following are subject to the general "produce duty:" Every income derived from professional or commercial business, from mines, from learned and other profitable occupations carried on by whomsoever within the boundaries of the country, excepting wages received for personal service and pensions, such income being only subject to an income tax. An exception is also made in the case of an income derived from such business undertakings as are liable to inspection by the official auditor. The taxes to be paid in this case are settled by a special enactment.

The basis of the general "produce duty," or "trade tax" (Erwerbssteuer), of every profit-bringing occupation is the net profit of the year previous to the year in which the tax is imposed. All expenses, therefore, requisite for acquiring, insuring, and maintaining the income must be deducted from the gross receipts.

The standard of taxation for learned professions amounts to 4 per cent, occasionally 5 per cent. As the indispensable amount requisite for the necessities of life in this rank 800 kronen are duty free "sub titulo" (under the title of) minimum of existence. The main amount of the general "produce duty" or "trade tax" was reckoned contingently at a maximum of 29,000,000 kronen and with an annual rise of 2 per cent. The law for the general "produce duty" or "trade tax" aims at taxing the actual trade and business receipts as ascertained by means of the official papers filled in by the taxpayers (bekenntnisse); the law therefore is not satisfied with mere objective or external expedient thus determining the matter, or with averages or probabilities. The standard of calculating and settling the amounts for the taxes is the principle of "self-taxation," the general "produce duty" or "trade tax," as well as the income tax, being settled annually, not by fiscal officials but by commissions from the ranks of the taxpayers themselves, being further in the second instance revised by such commissions, in many cases finally; the actual final decision in the third instance lies within the sphere of the court of judicial administration (verwaltungsgerichtshof).

The taxpayer is bound to fill in the official declaration papers. If he does not comply with this duty, he is liable, according to the profit-producing occupation concealed, to an additional charge of 1 per cent of the tax settled in the course of the calculations made by the commission; and should he still refuse to fill in the official declaration after renewed summons, he is liable to a further payment of 4 per cent. The law, however, does not demand that the business books and business accounts should be displayed; but should the taxpayer do so of his own free will, then the law provides for the preservation of all business secrets.

If any person liable to the payment of taxes does not fill in a paper of declaration, or if the declaration made is not satisfactory, the business profits which form the basis for the tax is determined according to the interest of the money invested in the premises and in the working capital, the number of business employees, and the amount of the rent paid for dwelling room and business premises by the person bound to pay such taxes.

The amount of business profits (Erwerbsgewinn) officially settled in the first instance by the above-mentioned commission may not, however, be less than such minimum business profits as stand in adequate proportion to the rent paid by the taxpayer for his dwelling and the business premises, this minimum of profit being calculated according to the manner prescribed by the law. Should it, however, be ascertained in the course of the inquiry that the actual net profit does not even reach the minimum basis, then the minimum tax basis may be reduced to half the amount.

In particular occupations the law fixes certain minimum rates of tax lower than which the produce duty or trade tax can not be calculated. Thus the minimum tax rates vary in the following manner:

"Tenants (lessees) pay 2 per cent of the annual value of the rent and other obligations, artisans 6–10 kronen, butchers according to the quality and number of beasts killed during the year preceding the year in which the tax is imposed and the number of inhabitants in the district."

Finally, certain business branches are subject to special taxation. For instance, peddlers not having any permanent business quarters and commercial travelers in foreign countries pay a fixed amount of taxes in one sum, and that before starting business, namely, at the time when their licenses are either made out or officially viséed.

The most far-reaching alteration in the Hungarian tax reform is the creation of the direct personal income tax. This takes the place of the hitherto existing supplementary payment of the general income tax, which was no income tax in the real sense of the word, but a simple per cent supplement of the existing "proceeds duty" (Ertragssteuer) or taxes on property, real or personal, etc. (Objektssteuern), respectively. Thus the ground and house property formed 30 and 40 per cent, respectively, of the rating of ground and house tax, and the personal trade produce formed 35 per cent of the tax of the additional supplement of the general income tax.

The newly introduced income tax includes the whole income of the taxpayers, without reference to its origin and without reference to the fact whether certain parts of the income subject to the income tax are not derived from sources of income which are exempt from the other taxes. As a basis for the income tax, therefore, that part of the income likewise serves which is derived from duty-free ground property, houses, industrial undertakings, and other profitable occupations, and finally, from duty-free scrip (wertpapiere).

Whereas the other taxes laid on the income are mostly based on an average and tax the income at its source, an endeavor is made by means of this supplementary and equalizing income tax to tax the real and actual total income of a person, while taking all the individual circumstances into special account.

The Hungarian income tax really signifies, as regards all incomes, a fresh taxation, with the exception of payments received for personal service, which are only subject to the general income tax; further, those parts of the income which are exempt from "proceeds duty" (ertragssteuer) and taxes on property, real or personal, etc. The reason why payments for service come under a different heading is because, as a rule, the amount of this kind of income is known to the last farthing, and by a taxation they would therefore be placed in a most unfavorable situation in comparison with that personal trade or business income which can not be calculated to its full amount.

The higher payments for service are, however, taxed according to a higher standard of taxation, as they are not only subject to an income-tax rate, but also to a special additional payment, as will be mentioned later on when referring to the income-tax standard. With payments for service the additional sum customarily paid for quarters (quartiergeld) has to be calculated in the tax basis.

In the income tax is included a so-called "absentee tax" (Abwesenheitssteuer), i. e., in calculating the income-tax basis the income gained by taxpayers owning house or grounds is trebled in cases where these taxpayers have no permanent dwelling or household within the boundaries of the country, and who have not resided in the country for four months at least during the preceding year.

As a rule the income during the preceding year forms the basis for calculating the income tax. With payments for service of a permanent character, however, the amount of the payment received at the time the tax has been calculated is decisive.

Legal officials are also subject to income taxes, as also limited liability companies and trade unions.

To the income of a taxpayer has to be added the income of his wife living under the same roof with himself. Also the income of all the other members of the household have, as a rule, to be added to the income of the head of the family; consequently the whole income of the household, regarded as one economic unit, is subject to the income tax.

If the taxpayer already pays an income tax or some tax corresponding to the same in another country on an income derived from that country, this income is not liable to the income tax under conditions of fiscal reciprocity between the countries.

The law contains detailed specifications in calculating the net income of the taxpayers. These items may be deducted from the gross amount of single sources of income. Such items are: All expenses incurred for acquiring, insuring, and maintaining the income, the business losses, policies of insurance against fire, etc., the indirect taxes, legal payments, and duties in connection with the conducting of business, deductions for wear and tear, interest paid on debts, private legal debts, life-insurance policies up to a certain amount, etc. The direct taxes, however, may not be deducted.

For the valuation of the income from the principal sources of income, the law also contains instructions and specified decisions laid down according to fixed principles. In this respect the following point of view is the standard, namely, that the actual income of the taxpayer is to be ascertained by avoiding any reference to the averages calculated on "proceeds duties" (Ertragsteuern) and the cadastre.

Thus in landed property net profit, according to the cadastre, need not necessarily be taken as basis for the tax, but the profits actually obtained by the working of the estate. In the same way the actual annual profits obtained from house property are to be ascertained.

An income derived from an occupation belonging to those liable to "produce duty" or "trade tax" (Erwerbssteuer) can, however, in calculating the basis of the income tax, be put down at the same amount as was settled by the said "trade tax," because in such cases the law endeavors to tax the net profits obtained.

The income-tax rate is progressive, commencing at 0.5 per cent and rising to 5 per cent; with an income of 2,000 kronen it amounts to 1 per cent, with an income of 5,600 kronen to 2 per cent, with 15,000 kronen 3 per cent, with 48,000 kronen 4 per cent, with more than 120,000 kronen 5 per cent is to be paid in such wise that the payment scale rises with every 5,000 kronen, and that each fresh amount in the scale counts as full 5,000 kronen.

In those limited-liability companies and trade unions exclusively dealing with industrial products the tax rate for an income of more than 15,000 kronen invariably amounts to 3 per cent.

By higher payments for service the law demands an additional income-tax payment, according to which a special supplementary tax has to be paid on pay for service or pensions rising above 7,000 kronen; the rate for this additional tax may rise from 0.2 per cent to 16 per cent, so that the highest rate of taxes on pay for service in reality amounts to 11 per cent.

In determining the tax amount the percentage is not included in the law, but the fixed rates set down for every kind of income. For instance, the income tax for over 800 kronen up to 900 kronen amounts to 5 kronen; over 900 kronen to 1,000 kronen, 6 kronen, etc.

The main factors kept in view while settling the scale of taxation are:

1. Collecting the official income declarations from the taxpayers.
2. The work of the commission selected to make a register of persons liable to taxation (zur Konskribierung der Steuerpflichtigen) and to value the income.
3. The working out of the tax valuation proposals (Steuerberechnungsanträge) on this basis at financial headquarters (Finanzdirektion).

Persons liable to taxation are, speaking generally, in duty bound to declare the amount of their income, excepting those whose total income does not exceed 2,000 kronen.

If the taxpayers do not comply with this duty, they are charged, as in the case of the general "trade" or "produce-duty tax," with supplementary payment of 1 per cent or 4 per cent, respectively, the amount of which is calculated in accordance with the tax hitherto determined on.

The center of gravity in the preliminary work for the tax estimates lies in the working of the conscription commissions (Konskriptions-Kommissionen), i. e., commissions for preparing a list of persons liable to taxation. This commission consists of 3 actual and 3 substitute members. The president is decided on by the board of finance (Finanzdirektion); the members are elected from the ranks of taxpayers and are selected by the municipal or parochial authorities.

The conscription commission collects the necessary data respecting the property, funds, and business of the taxpayers living in the district under their jurisdiction; obtains the most exact information on all heads and then, on the basis of this information, values the probable income of the taxpayers, classified according to their sources of income. Relying on this valuation, but not bound by it, the board of finance works out the proposed valuation of taxes according to the best of their knowledge, and these "proposals" (anträge) must then be open to public inspection for eight days in the different parishes, so that the taxpayers may be enabled to make their comments thereon.

By the valuation of the income tax the principle of self-taxation is given the utmost prominence; that is to say, an independent commission chosen from the ranks of the taxpayers settles the income tax, with special reference to the proposals for tax valuation prepared by the board of finance to the comments attached thereto and based on a knowledge of funds and income and of local individual circumstances.

The tax-valuation commission consists, besides the president, of six actual and six substitute members. The president and every two members are delegated by the minister of finance, two by the vice-president of the county council (vizegespan des komitates), or in towns with municipal rights by the mayor, and two by the chamber of trade and commerce belonging to the district, so that the members delegated by the ministry of finance are in the minority. The same is the case with the commission of appeal on taxation (steuerreklamations commission) constituted for deciding appeals in the second instance.

Neither in this case does the law grant the commission for tax valuation the right to examine the business books, but they may question witnesses and experts.

The income tax is calculated by the commission for tax valuation at the same time as the general "trade tax" or "produce duty" from year to year.

The taxpayers as well as the representatives of the treasury (Aerar) have a right to appeal against the decision of the commission for tax valuation, and in some cases a complaint can be addressed to the court of administration.

In conclusion, the law ordains that no state or municipal tax, or payment of tax arrears, respectively, may be imposed after the income tax. (Nachtragssteuer.)

An exception is made with the income tax derived from pay received for personal services; but here also a limitation is made, namely, that besides paying the income tax, state employees can only be further obliged to pay a supplementary sum for the sick fund. (Krankenverpflegssteuerzuschlag.)

Australia.

MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA, June 26, 1909.

INCOME-TAX SYSTEM OF VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA.

An income tax was first imposed in the State of Victoria in 1895 for a period of three years, expiring in 1898, in order to tide over a shortage in general revenue, but it has been extended from time to time ever since, and is now recognized as a permanent part of the fiscal system of the State.

Under the act of 1895 (No. 1374, hereto attached), which, though amended and altered in many respects by subsequent acts (also attached), is still the principal act under which the system is administered, provision was made for the appointment of a commissioner of taxes, who, with his officers, is under civil-service regulations. The commissioner and staff were in the service of the State prior to the establishment of the income-tax department and were transferred from various other branches of the government in order to form the new department. Section 4 of the act requires all officials of the department to maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of matters which come to them in the course of their official duties, and prescribes a penalty not exceeding £500 ($2,433.25) or imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve months, or both penalty and imprisonment, for contravening the oath. All officials are paid a fixed salary, and it is the policy of the department to retain a regular staff and not to employ, except under very pressing need, temporary clerical assistance. The officials of the department consist of the commissioner, who is also master in equity of the supreme court and master in lunacy, who receives a total salary of £1,800 ($8,759.70) per annum for the three offices; deputy commissioner, at a salary of £600 ($2,919.90); chief clerk, £440 ($2,141.36); accountant, £400 ($1,946.60); chief assessor, £335 ($1,630.27); senior assessor, £335 ($1,630.27); court officer, £335 ($1,630.27); registrar, £335 ($1,630.27); one clerk at £350 ($1,703.27); five at £285 ($1,386.95); one at £260 ($1,265.29); five at £210 ($1,021.96); eight at £200 ($973.30); and twenty at salaries ranging from £180 ($875.97) to £50 ($243.32); together with two messengers, at £120 ($583.98) and £42 ($204.39), respectively.

Incomes assessed for taxation in any year are those earned, derived, or received in Victoria in the preceding calendar year, and are divided into two classes, viz: (1) Incomes from personal exertion, and (2) incomes from property. "Personal exertion" is defined by the act to mean "all income consisting of earnings, salaries, wages, allowances, superannuation, or retiring allowances or stipends earned in or derived from Victoria, and all income arising or accruing from any trade carried on in Victoria," and income from property to mean "all income derived in or from Victoria and not derived from personal exertion."

The rate of tax is fixed annually by an "income tax rate act," and from 1895 to 1902, inclusive, it was fourpence (8 cents) in the £1 ($4.8665) on the first £1,200 ($5,839.80) of the taxable amount (allowing for £200 ($973.30) exemption), sixpence (12 cents) on the next £1,000 ($4,866.50), and eightpence (16 cents) on all over £2,260 ($10,706.30) on income from personal exertion, and double these rates on income from property. These rates have varied from time to time, according to the condition of the general revenue of the State, but for the present year (1909) they are the same as for last year, being the lowest yet imposed, viz: On the income of a person not being a company, derived from personal exertion, for every £1 ($4.86) up to £500 ($2,433.25), threepence (6 cents); over £500 ($2,433.25) and up to £1,000 ($4,866.50), fourpence (8 cents); £1,000 ($4,866.50) and up to £1,500 ($7,299.75), fivepence (10 cents); and over £1,500 ($7,299.75), sixpence (12 cents); with double these rates if the income be derived from property; on the income of any company, not being a life insurance company, sevenpence (14 cents) in the £1 ($4.86), and on the income of a life insurance company which carries on business in Victoria, eightpence (16 cents) in the £1.

A tax of £5 ($24.33) is also levied on every £100 ($486.65) of the amount payable to the owner or charterer of a ship whose principal place of business is out of Victoria for the carriage of passengers, live stock, mails, or goods shipped in Victoria. A rebate of 20 per cent was allowed to each individual off the tax chargeable during 1908, which is also in force during this year, but the rebate is not allowed to companies. Both in 1908 and in this year an exemption of the sum of £150 ($729.97) is allowed on all incomes from £201 ($978.16) to £500 ($2,433.25); above £500 ($2,433.25) no exemption is allowed. No income below £200 ($973.30) is assessed for taxation. As in the case of the rebate of 20 per cent, no exemption is allowed to companies which pay on all profits from £1 ($4.86) and upward. In connection with these rates it may be mentioned that no direct inheritance tax is in force, but the following probate and succession duties are payable on the estates of deceased persons after the deduction of all debts and before distribution to the persons entitled to such estates, viz: Less than £200 ($973.30), nil; above £200 ($973.30) and up to £300 ($1,459.95), 1½ per cent; then increasing one-half per cent for each £100 ($486.65) up to £600 ($2,919.90); then increasing one-third per cent for each £200 ($973.30) up to £1,000 ($4,866.50); above £1,000 ($4,866.50) and up to £1,500 ($7,299.75), 4 per cent; then increasing one-fourth per cent for each £500 ($2,433.25) up to £6,000 ($29,199); then increasing one-fifth per cent for each £1,000 ($4,866.50) up to £19,000 ($92,463.50); with the exception of the two stages, £10,000 to £11,000 ($48,655 to $53,531.50) and £14,000 to £15,000 ($68,131 to $72,997.50), which involves an increase of two-fifths per cent, and whose rates are, respectively, 7⅛ and 8½; over £19,000 ($92,463.50) and up to £20,000 ($97,330), 9½ per cent; and over £20,000 ($97,330) 10 per cent is charged.

The following special rates are in force on property left by the deceased to his widow, children, or grandchildren, except that in cases where the total value of the estate, after payment of all debts, does not exceed £2,000 ($9,733) half of these rates only are charged, viz:

"Up to £500, nil; over £500 ($2,433.25) and up to £1,000 ($4,866.50), 1 per cent; over £1,000 ($4,866.50) and up to £2,000 ($9,733), 3 per cent; then increasing by one-third per cent for each £1,000 ($4,866.50) up to £5,000 ($24,332.50), and by one-fourth per cent for each £1,000 ($4,866.50) up to £8,000 ($38,932); over £8,000 ($38,932) and up to £10,000 ($48,665), 5 per cent; increasing then by one-fifth per cent for each £2,000 ($9,733) up to £24,000 ($116,796), for each £4,000 ($19,466) up to £80,000 ($389,320), and for each £5,000 ($24,332.50) up to £100,000 ($486,650), the last group, £96,000 to £100,000 ($467,184 to $486,650), being subject to 9½ per cent; over £100,000 ($486,650), the amount payable is 10 per cent. An estate, however, is subject to the probate duty only and the recipients of legacies or bequests are exempt from payment of income tax on such legacies or bequests."

Trading companies were originally exempt from the payment of income tax, and the dividends declared by them were deemed to be part of the income of the member or shareholder, but they are now directly assessed on their profits and the taxpayer is not called upon to include dividends in his schedule. Mining companies were also originally exempt, but now pay a direct tax on the total amount of the dividends declared by such company during the year. Life insurance companies pay upon a sum equal to £30 per cent of the life assurance premiums. This is upon the ordinary life premiums, but industrial life insurance premiums pay only upon 15 per cent of the premium. With the foregoing exceptions of companies which pay upon their profits, income is not taxed at its source, but in the hands of the person receiving or entitled to it, shareholders in a company being exempt on the dividends or share of profits received by them from such companies.

The following are among the deductions from income allowable before taxation, viz:

"Interest paid on mortgage of property, repairs to property or plant but not including cost of additions or improvements, taxes, fire insurance, life insurance, fidelity guaranty, etc., premiums not exceeding £50 ($243.32), gifts exceeding £20 ($97.33) each to public or charitable institutions, calls or contributions paid into companies in liquidation or mining companies carrying on operations in Victoria, rent of business premises and salaries to employees, bad debts, depreciation and wear and tear of machinery, implements, etc., used for the purpose of trade, cost of sustenance of employees when supplied in addition to wages or salary of such employees, and losses incurred in the production of income. No deduction is allowed for the cost of maintenance of the family of a taxpayer."

The following are the principal exemptions from payment of the tax at present:

"Incomes which do not exceed £200 ($973.30); salary of governor of Victoria; income of municipalities and certain public and local bodies such as the university, metropolitan board of works (controlling the water supply), railway commission (controlling the government railways), fire brigades board, harbor trust commission, marine board, etc., and of any other local authority in so far as such income is official and not personal; income of all bodies formed solely for the promotion of religion; income of any mutual life assurance company whose head or principal office or principal place of business is in Australia; income of any fire, fidelity, guaranty, or marine assurance or insurance company registered under the "stamp act" and thus contributing to the revenue through another branch of the government on a basis of 1½ per cent of all premiums received; income derived from interest on bonds, debentures, etc., of the government of Victoria by residents or nonresidents. The onus of proof that any income is exempt from or entitled to any deduction rests with the taxpayer. Government employees are not exempt from taxation."

The act requires that schedules of income derived from personal exertion and of income the produce of property shall be calculated separately, and the requisite forms, with envelopes addressed to the commissioner of taxes, are provided free at every post-office in the State. The schedules may also be transmitted to the commissioner free of postage. The commissioner is required to give not less than fourteen days' public notice of the day on or before which the returns of income are to be furnished (usually on March 31st of each year), and the act permits merchants and others in trade a longer period after the expiration of the year for which assessment is to be made in which to compile their schedules than those whose income is derived from personal exertion or from property, the period allowed being discretionary with the commissioner. When the taxpayer's schedule has been received by the commissioner, it is assessed for taxation, and a notice of the amount of tax and the date payable is issued by mail to the taxpayer. If the tax remains unpaid at the expiration of twenty-one days after the due date (fourteen days after the issue of the notice), 8 per cent per annum of the amount of the tax unpaid must be added thereto. In default of payment provision is made by which the amount is recoverable through the county courts of the State by summoning the defaulter to appear before the court within fourteen days, and if within six days after the issue of the summons a written statement on oath showing a defense on its merits is not received by the court in which the summons is returnable, the court may make an order for the amount claimed without awaiting the appearance of the defendant.

Any person making a false return or evading the tax is liable to a fine not less than £2 ($9.73) or more than £100 ($486.65), upon conviction, and the payment of double the tax sought to be evaded, with 8 per cent per annum interest, and any person aiding or abetting such offense is also liable to a fine of not less than £2 ($9.73) or more than £50 ($243.32). In knowingly and willfully making a false return the taxpayer is also liable to prosecution for perjury. In the notice of the amount of tax payable issued by the commissioner, the last day on which objection to the amount of tax will be received is also stated, and such objections must be in writing and reach the commissioner on or before that date to receive consideration. If the taxpayer is dissatisfied with the ultimate decision of the commissioner, he may remit the dispute to a county court with the further right of stating a special case for the opinion of the supreme court of the State, but the latter course is seldom resorted to. Courts may award the cost of the action against the commissioner if he fails to sustain his case. The provisions made for detection of fraud rest primarily with the income-tax office, and a system by means of check tabs has been in force to trace large payments for interest, rents, salaries, etc., from the schedule of the payor to that of the payee. The municipal rolls are used, and lists of salaries and interest paid are called for by the act from employers, banks, and companies. Trustees and agents are also required to lodge returns, and other such information available as may be gleaned from newspapers or periodicals of the State, from the police, and from other sources. The commissioner may also call for new or further and fuller returns than furnished, has power to require information and the production of deeds, books, accounts, etc., from any person whomsoever, and to require the attendance of any person for oral examination.

The following tables show the number of assessments, taxpayers, taxable income, tax payable from personal exertion and property during the last five years, together with occupations of taxpayers by classes:

Indefinite	4,250	12.24	42.22
Companies	968	2.79	----------
Total	34,713	100.00	----------

The commercial class, which forms over 27 per cent of the taxpayers, has the proportion of only 15 per cent of the total breadwinners in the population, whilst primary producers, which include breadwinners in agricultural, pastoral, and mining pursuits, make up 22½ per cent of the taxpayers, but 31 per cent of the breadwinners; the industrial class contributes nearly 14 per cent to the taxpayers, and forms 27 per cent of the breadwinners; while the professional class, contributing 14 per cent to the taxpayers, forms only 7 per cent of the breadwinners. Of the definite classes, that contributing the highest percentage of taxpayers in proportion to its number in the population is the professional, with 14 per cent; the commercial coming next, with 12 per cent; then primary producers, with 4¾ per cent; and last, the domestic class, with 2¼ per cent. Of the amount paid as tax, companies yielded 34 per cent of the total; while the indefinite class, forming 12 per cent of the taxpayers, yielded 15 per cent of the tax. The commercial class, forming 27 per cent of the taxpayers, gave nearly 19 per cent of the tax; primary producers, forming 22½ per cent of the taxpayers, gave 14 per cent of the tax; the industrial class, forming 14 per cent of the taxpayers, gave 8 per cent of the tax; and the professional class, forming 14 per cent of the taxpayers, gave 7 per cent of the tax.

According to the last report of the commissioner of taxes the cost of collection of the tax, including salaries and all expenses, during the financial year ended June 30, 1908, was £13,879 14s. 5d. ($67,545.65), being £4 7s. 5d. per cent of the revenue collected ($21.26 in $486.65), or, approximately, $2.19 per taxpayer.

India.

CALCUTTA, INDIA, August 12.

A copy of the Indian income-tax act of 1886, as amended, is hereto attached.

Income tax is chargeable in India on all sources of income accruing and arising or received in British India, with the exception of—

1. The exemptions mentioned in section 5 of the act.
2. Special exemptions sanctioned from time to time under section 6 of the act.

For the purposes of the tax sources of income are divided into the following four classes:

I. Salaries and pensions.
II. Profits of companies.
III. Interest on securities.
IV. Other sources of income.

I. SALARIES AND PENSIONS.

Any salary, annuity, pension, or gratuity of 2,000 rupees ($666.67) and upward per annum is chargeable with income tax at the rate of 5 pies in the rupee (five-twelfths of one-sixteenth of 32.44½ cents, practically five-sixths of a cent in 32.44½ cents, approximately 2½ per cent), any salary, etc., of less than 2,000 rupees ($666.67) per annum, but not less than 1,000 rupees ($333.33) per annum is chargeable at the rate of 4 pies (four-twelfths of one-sixteenth of 32.44½ cents, practically two-thirds of a cent in 32.44½ cents, approximately 2 per cent). The tax is recovered from servants of government or of a local authority at the time of payment of the salary, annuity, pension, or gratuity. A similar procedure is ordinarily prescribed for the recovery of the tax from salaries, etc., paid by a company or a private employer, but in such cases the collector may enter into an arrangement with the employer for the convenient recovery of the tax. The demand in the case of government servants is easily ascertainable; statements have to be prepared and submitted to the collector in a prescribed form on or before the 15th of April in each year in the case of servants of companies, local authorities, etc.

II. PROFITS OF COMPANIES.

The rate of income tax levied on the net profits of a company is 5 pies in the rupee (about five-sixths of a cent in 32.44½ cents; approximately 2½ per cent). The principal officer of a company has to submit by the 15th of April each year a statement, prepared in the manner prescribed in section 11 of the act, of the net profits made in British India by the company. Should the collector consider such a statement to be incomplete or incorrect, he can require the company to produce the account to enable him to determine the correct amount. In calculating net profits the following deductions are usually allowed from the gross receipts of a company:

1. Sums expended in the repairs of implements, utensils, or articles used solely for the purpose of trade.
2. Sums expended for insuring, or keeping insured, the buildings, machinery, implements, and stock used for the purpose of the trade, and the rent paid for any premises used for such trade; and provided that if such premises have not been exclusively used for such trade, a fair proportion only of such rent is deducted from the gross receipts.
3. Actual expenditure during the year on repairs and renewal of such premises, if such repairs or renewal are at the cost of the company.
4. Sums expended in the payment of persons employed solely in such trade.
5. The amount of any losses of the stock in trade. The excess loss sustained in any one or more trades over and above the profits thereof may be set off against the excess profits of any other trade exercised by the same company.
6. The amount of any bad debts for the first time ascertained and written off as such during the year.
7. Interest paid on money borrowed for the purpose of trade.
8. Amount actually expended from the profits of the year for depreciation up to a limit of 10 per cent on the value of the machinery and plant.

The companies are taxed at their principal place of business, and where a company has several such places the local government (if they are in territories subject to that government) or the government of India (if they are in territories subject to different local governments) have power to decide which shall be considered to be the principal place of business.

In the case of income from houses, the following deductions are generally allowed:

1. Any rent or quitrent paid by the assessee on account of such houses or their sites, but not taxes or local rates or cesses.
2. Sums expended for insuring and keeping insured such houses.
3. Actual expenditure during the year on repairs and renewal of such premises, if such repairs and renewals are at the cost of the company.
4. Sums expended in collecting the rent, not exceeding 6 per cent of the gross rental.
5. Annual interest payable to a mortgage not in possession.

The collector determines the amount at which the company is to be assessed and the time when that amount shall be paid.

III. INTEREST ON SECURITIES.

The income tax levied on interest paid on securities is at 5 pies in the rupee (about five-sixths of a cent in 32.44½ cents; approximately 2½ per cent) on such interest, unless the owner of the security can produce a certificate signed by the collector that his annual income from all sources is less than 1,000 rupees ($333.33), in which case no deduction is made from the interest, or unless he produces a like certificate that his income from all sources is less than 2,000 rupees ($666.67), in which case the rate will be 4 pies in the rupee (about two-thirds of a cent in 32.44½ cents; approximately 2 per cent). The tax is deducted at the time the interest is paid by the person empowered to pay the interest, and is paid by that person to the credit of government.

IV. OTHER SOURCES OF INCOME.

Other sources of income mean any source not included in I, II, and III, above. The tax is levied on a graded scale from 20 rupees ($6.67) on an income of 1,000 rupees ($333.33) to 42 rupees ($14) on 1,999 rupees ($666.33), the tax on income of 2,000 rupees ($666.67) and upward being 5 pies in the rupee (five-sixths of a cent in 32.44½ cents; approximately 2½ per cent). The system of assessment is the same as that observed in assessing the profits of companies, with the exception that under this part a person is not, generally speaking, required to submit a return of his income. The details of the mode of assessment and collection are given in sections 16–24 of the income-tax act. It is not obligatory on persons assessed under this part to render a return of their income unless this is called for by the collector under clauses (b) and (c) of section 18 of the act.

Though the word "income" is used in section 15 of the act, it is only on the net income that the tax is levied. The deductions allowed from the gross income are generally the same as those in the case of companies detailed in paragraph 3 above.

Sections 25–50 of the income-tax act contain provisions regarding the revision of assessment under IV, recovery of arrears of tax, and penalties, etc.

The following statement gives for the year 1906–7, the last for which complete statistics under these heads are available, the total number of income-tax payers, the total yield of tax, the total amount of income assessed to tax, the cost of collection, the percentage of income-tax payers to the total population, and the percentage of the cost of collection to total income tax:

1. Number of income-tax payers, 255,762.
2. Yield of tax, 21,171,639 rupees ($7,057,213).
3. Total income assessed to tax, 850,500,000 rupees ($283,500,000).
4. Cost of collection, 362,042 rupees ($120,681).
5. Total population, 231,899,597.
6. Percentage of income-tax payers to the total population, 0.11 per cent.
7. Percentage of the cost of collection to total income tax, 1.7 per cent.

There are no statistics showing the families of the persons paying the income tax. The officers collecting income tax are paid fixed salaries, and are usually officers belonging to the ordinary staff employed in connection with land revenue and general administration.

No distinction is made between "earned" and "unearned" income for the purpose of income tax.

As regards an inheritance tax, the Indian succession act, 1865, does not apply to Hindus, Mohammedans, and Buddhists. They are not liable to pay succession duty, except in the following cases:

a On certificate under Act VII of 1899 for the collection of debts of deceased persons.

b On probate and letter of administration under Act V of 1881, where such probate or letters of administration are taken out.

c On probates and letter of administration under the Hindu wills act, 1870.

Switzerland.

BERNE, SWITZERLAND, April 22, 1909.

In reply to the circular instructions, I have the honor to state that the matter of taxation in Switzerland is governed by 25 different cantonal laws and over 7,000 local laws, and that there exists no federal law on the subject. Therefore it would be impossible to make a correct report on the very complicated tax systems of the various Cantons and half Cantons of the Confederation. There exist no federal statistics giving information as to the amount of the income of the various Cantons, the number of taxpayers, etc.

In all the cantons the income tax on earned and unearned income is collected at a certain rate for the Canton and a certain rate for the commune.

For example, in the city of Berne, Canton of Berne, the income tax is collected as follows:

	For the city.	For the Canton.
I. On professional income, of which 600 francs ($120) are free	Per cent. 3	Per cent. 3½
II. Income derived from pensions and annuities, of which 100 francs ($20) are free	4	5
III. Income derived from money not placed on mortgages, of which 100 francs ($20) are free	5	6½
IV. On property:
A. Real estate, according to the cantonal assessment, less the amount of any mortgage the tax on which is paid in the same Canton	2	2½
B. Capital placed on mortgages	2	2½
Church tax on earned income on property	¼ .30
	¼ .20

Usually in the months of March and April all the taxpayers are provided with blank forms for self-taxation, in which they have to insert their income, earned and unearned, as well as their property. The blanks must be returned within a limited time to the taxation commission for examination and approval. A taxpayer who neglected to answer the questions in the self-taxation blank is taxed by the taxation commission, and no appeal is allowed him.

The members of the taxation commission, representing commerce, trade, administration, working classes, etc., are selected by the commune council.

After examination and approval by the taxation commission the properly executed self-taxation sheets are turned over to the tax bureau of the city to be recorded and the tax notifications issued. The taxes are collected in the months of October, November, and December at the city tax bureau. The taxpayers are informed in the notification of the day on which to appear at the tax bureau for the payment of the taxes specified in the notification. Cantonal, communal, and church taxes are collected at the city tax bureau.

In case of fraudulent taxation the taxpayer is punished with a fine "twice the amount of the income tax he withdrew from taxation for the past ten years."

The inheritance-tax law of the Canton of Berne prescribes: On all real estate situated in the Canton of Berne which changes hands through inheritance or legacy a tax has to be paid into the Bernese treasury. The citizenship and domicile of the deceased, or the heir, the donor, and the receiver in no way influence the taxation of real estate.

All personal property is submitted to the same taxation, whether through inheritance or donation, if the deceased or the donor—the former at the time of his decease and the latter at the time of donation—either had a domicile in the Canton of Berne, or, in the absence of such a domicile, resided therein.

The citizenship of deceased or donor and the citizenship of the heir, the legatee, or receiver usually in no way influence the taxation of the personal property.

Inheritance, legacies, and donation are exempt from taxation in the following cases:

1. If the heirs of the deceased or donor are in direct line of descent.

2. If the heir or receiver is the husband of the wife, or the wife from the husband, and there exist children or grandchildren.

3. If they were made in favor of Swiss public institutions, such as hospitals, houses for poor, sick, or orphans, as well as for teacher schools and other education institutions, and for funds for the maimed and the sick.

If institutions similar to the above, but of private character, are concerned the executive council of the Canton, under certain circumstances, grant total or partial exemption from taxation.

4. If the total value falling to a single person from one inheritance or donation in any form whatsoever does not exceed, in the case of childless married people, 5,000 francs; in all other cases 1,000 francs.

On property on which, according to the law of inheritance or donation, tax has to be paid, such tax, after deduction of (1) legacies and debts to be paid therefrom, inclusive of the property brought by the wife if she inherits to her husband, and (2) the gifts which are to be paid by the heirs or receivers to the institutions mentioned above, is as follows:

A. One per cent if the heir or receiver is either the husband or the wife of the deceased and if there are no children out of the marriage.

B. One per cent in the case of parents inheriting from their children; 2 per cent in the case of grandparents inheriting from their grandchildren.

C. If the relationship of the heir or receiver to the donor or deceased is of second degree, 2 per cent in case of brother and sister (and those half-brothers and half-sisters mentioned in the French Civil Code).

If the relationship is of the third degree, 4 per cent in the case of uncle and nephew, and those half-brothers and half-sisters mentioned in the Bernese Civil Code.

If the relationship is of the fourth degree, 6 per cent in the case of children of brothers and sisters; 8 per cent if the relationship is of the fifth degree; 10 per cent if the relationship is any further, or if no relationship exist at all.

If the total amount falling to one person exceeds 50,000 francs, an additional tax of the half of that levied according to the degree of relationship, above mentioned, will be collected on the amount above the 50,000 francs.

Ten per cent of the inheritance or donation tax is delivered to the commune of residence of the deceased for educational purposes.

The inclosed print will furnish information as to the income taxes collected in the various cities of the Swiss Confederation.

The Netherlands.

The income tax here is divided into:

A. The property tax, which is levied on income derived from property.

B. The tax on business and other incomes, which is levied on the income derived from business and professional callings, as well as on reserve pay, pensions and annuities, etc.

In so far as the property income is devoted to the interests of the business or calling, the interest on the capital so invested shall be deducted from the net profits of the business or calling.

At the same time this tax affects the profits made in this country by others than those actually residing in this country. (See article 1 of the law relating to income from business or professional callings.)

This subdivision of the tax is not hereafter regarded.

The tax is estimated according to the value of the property, in so far as the property tax is concerned, or of the income, in so far as the income from business or professional callings is concerned.

The percentage to be levied is moderately progressive.

The tax amounts to:

A. In regard to the property tax, saving a somewhat lower levy on the lowest taxed properties, it is 1¼ per cent of the property, provided this does not exceed 200,000 francs ($80,000), and 2 per cent on the excess thereof, in both cases after a deduction of 10,000 francs ($4,020). Properties of a lower value than 13,000 francs ($5,628) are exempt. (See article 10 of the law relating to property tax.)

On an interest basis of 4 per cent this tax may therefore be estimated as amounting to respectively 3⅛ to 5 per cent of the income derived from property.

B. In regard to income from business and professional callings, if the income exceeds 1,500 francs ($603), there is a fixed charge of 14 francs ($5.63), besides 2 per cent on the excess of 1,500 francs ($603). If the income exceeds 8,200 francs ($3,296.40), the excess thereof is taxed at the rate of 3½ per cent. Incomes below 650 francs ($261.30) are free. In regard to those between 650 francs ($261.30) and 1,500 francs ($603) I have the honor to refer you to article 9 of the law relating to incomes from business and professional callings.

Further, provision is made for the necessary connection of the property tax and that on income from business and professional callings by bearing in mind, in fixing the tax on income from callings, the exemption in the property tax of the first 10,000 francs ($4,020). Moreover, in the regulation of the progression in the tax on incomes from business and professional callings, that connection with the property tax is taken into account.

In this regard I have the honor to refer you to articles 2, section 2, and 9B of the law relating to the tax on incomes from business and professional callings. The tax is levied on the statements made in respect to their property or income by the parties liable, with this proviso, that the administrators are at liberty to deviate from that statement. In that case appeal may be made to a specially instituted council.

There are no penalties for incorrect statements respecting property or income. But if it is apparent that a statement respecting property is too low, in that case another assessment may be levied of five times the deficient tax paid. (See articles 45A and further of the law relating to the property tax.)

The property tax is levied according to the state of the property at the commencement of the fiscal year, the tax on incomes in accordance with the probable income during the current fiscal year. Incomes for temporary work alone are brought under the income of the fiscal year following upon that in which they are made. In this regard see article 4 of the law relating to income from business and professional callings.

In respect to the relationship between the property tax and that on income from callings and that of other state revenues, it may be said that according to the statistics for the year 1905, it was as follows:

The property tax, 4.73 per cent of the total revenue.

Tax on incomes, 4.24 per cent of the total revenue.

In this regard it must be borne in mind that in the said percentage of 4.24 per cent the tax levied on persons domiciled in this country is embraced to 72.18 per cent thereof. The rest has been levied on liable persons residing abroad (to the amount of 2.88 per cent) and of corporations established in the country (limited liability companies) for 24.94 per cent.

	Per cent of total revenue.
Land tax	7.87
House tax	5.71
Excise	51.40
Succession dues	8.48
Stamp registration and mortgage dues	6.90
Import dues	6.65
Other revenues	23.93

The total return from the property tax in the year 1905–6 amounted to 8,203,381 francs ($3,297,759). The total number of assessed, the size of whose families is not known, amounted to 88,750, namely, 1.591 per cent of the total population of 5,577,632 souls. The total amount of assessed properties amounted, in thousands, to 6,383,818.

Of these assessments an augmentation has been imposed of 77,476 in accordance with the original or subsequent voluntarily increased statements to the total amount of 7,581,476 francs ($3,447,753); 10,299 by increase of the statement officially to a total amount of 525,542 francs ($2,112,679); and 975 on those who made no statement, to a total amount of 96,362 francs ($38,737). The total returns from the tax on callings, in so far as they were levied on persons residing in the country in the fiscal year 1905–6, 5,899,946 francs ($2,371,778). The number of assessments was 352,541, the total amount of the assessed incomes 487,100,378 francs ($1,958,144). Of these, 315,995 assessed persons, to a total amount of 2,731,867 francs ($1,098,211), who are not assessed in the property tax. The incomes concerned in these assessments were increased to the amount altogether of 348,966,218 francs ($1,302,844).

From the above it is apparent that income from property is more heavily taxed than income from business or profession. In respect to succession dues, it may be said that this is levied, according to a nonprogressive tariff, on every inheritance from an estate in this country.

In the direct line of descent and between married people with children or descendants, 1 per cent; in the direct backward line, 3 per cent; between married people without children or descendants, 4 per cent; side lines, between brothers and sisters; between uncles and aunts on the one side and nephews and nieces on the other side, and vice versa; and between great-uncles and great-aunts on the one side and second cousins and second nieces on the other side, and vice versa, 6 per cent; in all other cases 10 per cent; wherever in the side line more is obtained than would be by inheritance at death, 10 per cent becomes due on that excess. (See art. 41 of the law relating to succession dues.)

Gifts in the direct line of descent and between married people and descendants are exempt, provided that which each receives does not exceed 1,000 francs ($402). If it exceeds 1,000 francs ($402), but is less than 1,500 francs ($603), in that case 500 francs ($201) is exempt from taxation. (See art. 56 of the law relating to succession dues.)

In addition to succession dues, transfer dues are levied on that part of the inheritance consisting of stocks and interest-bearing claims. This is, in the direct line, one-fourth per cent, and in all other cases 2 per cent. In addition thereto, 38 cents surtax is levied on succession and transfer dues.

A statement of the expenses of the property tax and the tax on incomes from business and professional callings can not be given, as the collection of those taxes is intrusted to officials who, at the same time, are charged with the collection of other taxes.

Denmark.

In Denmark the income tax is regulated by the law of May 15, 1903, according to which the tax is levied on a scale of from 1.3 per cent up to 2.5 per cent, and it has to be paid by all people living in Denmark. A reduction in the tax is made of such a nature that no tax is levied on the first $214 (800 kroner) of people living in the cities, or $160 (600 kroner) of people in the country districts, and a further deduction is made of $26 (100 kroner) for every child in Copenhagen and $18 (70 kroner) in the country. This provision will especially benefit the laboring class.

There is no difference between the tax on "earned" incomes, such as salaries, etc., and "unearned incomes," such as dividends.

Included in this income tax there is a property tax of 0.6 pro mille levied upon all property in Denmark, the only things that are held exempt being furniture, personal belongings, and also prospective rights, as a life insurance or a right to a future pension.

On an inheritance there is a certain inheritance tax, but the person who inherits does not pay an income tax on the amount which he inherits, for the reason that the inheritance tax has already been paid. Thus, in case a man inherited 100,000 kroner in 1907, he would have paid no income tax on that 100,000 in 1907, but in 1908 and afterwards would pay the income tax on the amount of the income from that 100,000 kroner.

Until now the taxes upon inheritance have been 1 per cent as between husband and wife, parent and child, or grandparent and grandchild; 4 per cent between other near relatives, as brothers or sisters and their children; and 7 per cent upon inheritance from distant relatives and strangers. Therefore when a man dies and his estate reverts to persons outside of his immediate family, the amount of the inheritance tax to be paid depends on the relationship to the deceased of the person inheriting. Thus the tax on the inheritance of a son would not be so heavy as it would be if a brother or a nephew inherited; and, again, the person inheriting pays no income tax, as has been illustrated, because the tax is already paid in the shape of an inheritance tax.

In regard to the system of assessment, it may be said, briefly, to be as follows: In each district some citizens are elected to a taxation board, and this is a duty from which but few can escape. In case of dispute as to the amount of assessment, there is a board for greater districts which might take the matter over, and above them all is the minister of finance.

Before a certain date every taxpayer can state his income on a form sent to everybody by the board. If a taxpayer does not do so, the taxation authorities will state his taxable income, and if the amount assessed does not exceed his real income as much as 25 per cent he has to submit to the decision of the board and pay accordingly. Had the taxpayer given a statement of his income this would not have occurred, but as he did not, if the taxation board does not overestimate his taxable income by 25 per cent or more, he has to pay; thus, if it is assessed 24 per cent more, he has to pay. If there is a dispute the taxpayer can complain, and will be called to a meeting of the board to state his reasons, and if an understanding is not reached an appeal can be made to the higher board and again from that to the minister of finance. It must be a serious question before a taxpayer can appeal to the courts. It is generally conceded that a taxpayer can appeal to the courts if he claims not to be taxable, or if an important question is involved, as where a corporation declines to pay on the ground that it is not taxable. It is an unwritten law that questions as to the payable amount of income tax can only be referred to the minister of finance as a last resource and can not be appealed to the courts.

The income tax is levied, not upon the source of the income, but upon the income from all sources. If incorrect or fraudulent statements are made, the taxpayer will be fined up to ten times the amount of the tax he has defrauded; but, generally, when it is more a matter of mistake, the question is settled with a lesser amount. If the fraud is discovered after a man's death, the estate of the deceased will have to pay double the amount not paid.

In order to detect any fraudulent statements, the taxpayer will be called on by the taxation board to explain himself, and all means at hand, as official and private information, can be made use of and demanded of any person supposed to know anything about the matter.

The income tax is levied half-yearly upon the amount of the income of the last year. Thus, for example, where an income was $10,000 in the year 1908, $10,000 would be the amount taxable during the year 1909.

Finally, it may be said that the collectors of the Danish income tax are officials and are not members of the assessment boards, who are civilians. These collectors are paid by a percentage of 1.5 of the whole amount collected, which total in 1907 came to about $2,150,000, while the number of income-tax payers in Denmark in 1908–9 was 337,011, which is 13 per cent of the total population of 2,588,919.

Germany.

The States comprising the German confederation contain about 20 income taxes. Among those that may be mentioned as embracing such system of taxes are Saxony, Grand Duchy of Baden, Grand Duchy of Hesse, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Austria, and virtually all of the minor German States. In almost every instance the method of assessment is by a return or declaration by the taxpayer, disclosing his total income; the method of collection at the source does not seem to be in vogue here.

Austria.

The Austrian progressive income-tax law came into force in 1898. Prior to this an income tax had existed from 1849, but its extreme high rate, amounting in some cases to 10 per cent on the net income, rendered it very difficult to assess and collect, on account of evasions of the law. In order to arrive at the net income on which the tax is levied, deductions from the gross income are made for upkeep of business, houses, and lands for the premiums paid, for insurance against injuries, for interest on business and private debts, and for payment of taxes other than the income tax.

Incomes up to £500 a year are free from income tax. The income tax is levied on an extended scale on incomes over £50 a year. Taxation commences at about 0.6 of the income. At the twelfth stage the tax rises to 1 per cent, at the twenty-seventh it rises to 2 per cent, at the forty-third to about 3 per cent, and at the fifty-sixth to about 3½ per cent. An income of over £4,000 pays about 4 per cent, and an income over that figure the tax approaches more and more closely to 5 per cent without ever quite reaching it.

The total yield of this tax to the treasury for the year 1905 was about 11,000,000.

The total amount of the income of the country, gross and net, which was assessed under the tax for 1902 was, gross, 135,520,000 pounds sterling; net, 117,110,000 pounds sterling. In general the idea is to weigh less heavily on the smaller income than on the larger one.

The exemptions comprise, among others, all members of the imperial family, all members of the diplomatic and consular service, those receiving pensions, salaries of members of the army and navy, and other military persons.

Progressive taxation is the same for all sorts of incomes, but the law defines the methods of taxing income derived from land, houses, industries (industries in the form of companies who emit shares are subject to another form of taxation), capital, salaries, and other sources of income.

The Austrian income tax is really a second tax on assets already taxed. The landed proprietor pays his land tax quite independently of his income tax. The possessor of invested capital in companies pays the tax on dividends; the merchant, manufacturer, artist, author, physician, lawyer, or proprietor of a school pays the industry tax. The only one who pays the income tax alone is the person who is merely in receipt of fixed salary or pay, and he also has to pay the salary tax if his salary or pay comes to more than £267 per annum.

In levying the tax on land, on buildings, and on industries, only the net income is taxed, allowance being made for all necessary deductions from the gross income for upkeep, etc.

There are a great many special allowances. Special allowances are made for incomes derived from labor, either physical or mental. The income of the whole of the family is reckoned together, but every member of the family who derived his income from labor has a deduction made of £21 before the remainder of his income is taxed.

Special allowances are made for a family with several children, depending upon their number and condition. There are also special exemptions in certain cases where the annual income does not exceed £4,167 10s., such as for educating children who have afflictions, expense in maintaining poor relations, perpetual illness, debts, acts of God, etc.

According to Austrian law, the merchant or manufacturer who is a householder and has investments in stocks, bonds, mortgages, etc., has to pay the industry tax on his manufactory or place of business, the building tax on his house, the tax on dividends for every investment in securities apart from his business, and, finally, income tax on his entire net income.

The tax is, in most cases, assessed on a direct return from individual taxpayers, except in the cases of fixed salaries and wages, on which the tax is collected from the employer, who is allowed either to deduct it from the salary of the person employed or to pay it out of his own pocket. The general method of assessing taxation is to take the income of the previous year. In January every taxpayer whose income is more than £81 must deliver to the tax collector a paper stating his income for the past year in actual figures if his income is fixed, and at the average of the last three years if it is fluctuating. In case of suspicion of an incorrect or fraudulent return, the treasurer and the commissioner can call witnesses and impound documents to prove their case, but they may only inspect the business ledgers if the taxpayer gives permission. Treasury officials are allowed, under certain conditions, to inspect the factories and workshops during working hours and to check the output. The usual appeals and penalties are connected with the plan of assessment. Half of the tax is due on the 1st of June and half on the 1st of December. The same machinery is employed in collecting all taxes, hence the cost of collecting the income tax can not be given.

Prussia.

The income-tax law of 1891 formed the basis for the complete reorganization of direct state and local taxation in Prussia. Under the present law all persons with incomes of over £150 a year have to send in an annual declaration of their full income divided according to the four main sources—capital, land and property, trade and industry, and employment bringing gain. Prussians and subjects of other states of the Empire domiciled in Prussia are liable to taxation, unless they come under the exemption clause. Foreigners are also liable if they are domiciled in Prussia or staying there for purposes of gain or for longer than one year. Joint stock companies, mining companies, limited liability companies, registered associations whose business extends outside the circle of their members, and cooperative stores are also liable to tax. Their income is estimated by the surpluses which are distributed as interest or dividends among members, with the addition of any sums used for the redemption of debt or capital, the improvement or extension of business, or the formation of a reserve fund. Three and one-half per cent is, however, deducted before assessment from the total thus estimated.

One of the main principles underlying the income-tax law is taxation according to capacity, and for this purpose a regular system of progressive taxation has been adopted. The normal rate is 3 per cent of the income. This rate calls for incomes under £500, and rises for incomes over £1,500 up to 4 per cent for those over £5,000. Taxation begins with an income of £45.

Certain abatements are allowed to taxpayers with incomes up to £475 whose solvency has been unfavorably affected by adverse economic circumstances.

In 1903 the number of income-tax payers was 38,977,821. The number of corporate bodies paying this tax was 2,598. The taxable income was £454,576,901. The tax altogether paid amounted to £9,317,915. In 1893 what is known as the "supplementary tax law" was passed. Its purpose was to more fully carry out the principle of the income-tax law, viz, the fair distribution of the burdens of state taxation, by more heavily taxing funded as compared with earned incomes, and also by supplementing the income-tax law where it did not sufficiently reach the wealthier classes.

SYSTEM OF ASSESSMENT OF INCOME TAX.

The income tax is both levied at the source in the case of companies and assessed on a direct return by the individual taxpayer of his income from all sources. Companies in paying dividends, etc., deduct the tax as part of its annual expenditure. The individual taxpayer, being assessed according to his income from all sources, has to pay again on the dividend he receives from the company, notwithstanding the fact that the latter has already been taxed. It is by way of compensation for this double taxation that companies are allowed to deduct from their income 3½ per cent of their capital. Salaries are not taxed before payment to the recipient. Fixed receipts are assessed, according to their amount for the taxation year which is about to begin. The assessment is made on the basis of the actual amount of income received from all sources at the time the returns are handed in, viz., November and December. Variable incomes are taxed on an average of the three years immediately preceding the assessment. The right of appeal exists both in favor of the taxpayer and the officials of the Government.

Persons delinquent in sending in the declarations and failing to do so immediately after the second request are penalized 25 per cent in addition to the tax at which they have been assessed. Incomplete or fraudulent declarations are punishable by a fine of from four to ten times the amount of which the State was thereby defrauded or by a minimum fine of £5.

SYSTEM OF COLLECTION.

The income tax and the supplementary tax are collected in the first half of the second month of each quarter by the communities, who bear the whole cost. No statistics are available giving the percentage cost of collection. Assessed amounts may in certain cases be reduced if their enforced collection would endanger the economic existence of taxpayers, or if the efforts to collect the tax would probably be of no avail.

In Prussia the income tax produces about one-third of the tax revenue.

Sweden and Norway.

The payment of an income tax in Sweden is governed by two laws—the law of 1897 and the law of 1902. The tax, in so far as it relates to income which may be derived from capital, labor, etc., is to some extent a progressive tax, inasmuch as all incomes below 500 kroner (£27 15s.) are exempt; from incomes between 500 kroner and 1,200 kroner (£66 13s.) 450 kroner (£25) are subtracted; from incomes between 1,200 kroner and 1,800 kroner (£100) 300 kroner (£16 13s.)

are subtracted; and the tax is only paid on the remainder. In towns where house rent is very high the maximum of exemption and the amounts subtracted may be increased by a sum not exceeding 200 kroner (£11 2s.)

The general supply is nearly always 1 per cent on incomes derived from capital and labor (subject to the above-mentioned exemptions and reductions).

The first tax law—that of 1897—did not provide for the taxation of incomes derived from dividends on investments in public companies and made no allowance for the proportion of incomes earmarked for payment of the interest on mortgages; hence, to meet the demand for additional revenue, the new law was enacted to supplement the old one. This new law introduces certain new principles of exemption, allowing the deduction from incomes of any amount paid as interest on mortgages and loans, and it provides for the payment of the tax by incomes which were previously unaffected, whereas the old law was thus less broad in its scope and effect.

It will be noticed that the new income-tax law proper affects incomes derived from all sources, including incomes from dividends on shares in companies, which were untouched by the former law, but admits the principle of subtracting from the total amount of income the proportion of such income paid as interest on loans and mortgages.

The rate of the tax is 1 per cent on all kinds of income. There is a progressive scale, not in the percentual rate, but in the estimation of the income on which it is raised, incomes of over 61,000 kronor (£339), being reckoned for the purpose of taxation at more than their actual value in ascending progression.

In ascertaining the assessment of land value it is assumed that the income from agricultural land is at the rate of 6 per cent on the assessed value. For example, assuming that the estate worth 100,000 kronor should produce an income of 6,000 kronor (£333); that is, 6 per cent, the income tax being 1 per cent on every 100 of estimated income, is therefore 60 kronor, or £3⅓. The actual income tax levied would not, however, amount to this sum if there were mortgages on the property, the estimated income being calculated at its net amount after deducting the sum paid as interest on the loan or mortgage.

In the case of other real estate the income is assumed to be 5 per cent on the assessed value of the property, and from this again deduction is made of any sum paid as interest on mortgage.

In 1903 the amount of income taxed was 685,729,215 kroner (£38,096,067). But in consequence of the progressive scale at which incomes are estimated for the purposes of taxation, the 1 per cent was in reality calculated as due from a total of 1,058,650,400 kronor (£58,813,911).

The number of income-tax payers in 1903 was 194,963 out of a total population of 5,221,291. Of this number 191,515 were private individuals, 789 public bodies, and 2,659 companies and banks. Thus one private individual in 27.26 of the population paid the tax.

The principle of graduation adopted in taxing income is thus supplied; small incomes below 1,000 kronor (£55)—including the income of the wife—are altogether exempt. Incomes between 1,000 and 4,000 kronor (£222), are taxed only on a portion of their full amount. Incomes from 4,000 to 6,100 kronor (£338 17s.) are taxed on their full amount. Incomes above 6,100 kroner are taxed on more than their actual amount, in a progressively ascending scale, up to a maximum of 145,500 kronor (£8,083), for which income tax is paid as on a sum of 50,082 kronor (£32,333); that is to say, four times the real income.

In addition to the deduction allowed for amounts payable as interest on mortgages or loans, certain other deductions from the amount of the estimated income is allowed, such as for necessary repairs, losses, bad debts, etc.

Since 1905 a system of slight differentiation exists.

Income tax is not paid at the source by companies and thereafter deducted in paying the dividend to the shareholders. But the companies, having themselves to pay an income tax on all dividends exceeding 6 per cent and the shareholder being obliged to declare on his honor the total amount of his income, this tax is assessed on a direct return by the individual taxpayer of his income from all sources.

Income on capital and income derived from labor other than wages or pensions is reckoned at the amount of the income of the immediately preceding year.

The following persons, companies, etc., are obliged by law to make declaration regarding the amount of their income without receiving any special notice: Companies which are provided with royal licenses or are registered as share companies, or are under public control; and, also, any taxpayer who was taxed the immediately preceding year for, or who enjoyed, an income of at least 1,000 kronor (£55) from landed estate or capital (shares and bank shares being here included).

The penalty for any person or company thus obliged to declare their income without notice, neglecting before April 1 to make proper declaration, is the loss of the right to a final appeal on the question of the amount of the income put down in the declaration.

It has been found impossible to ascertain the cost of collection.

There are two main systems of income tax in Norway—that of income tax paid to the municipal authorities, and income tax paid to the state. The state income-tax system is of recent date, being based on the municipal system, the same machinery for collecting the tax being used.

Taxes on real property in Norway are quite distinct from income tax. The same may be said of taxes on personal property, except in so far as they may have a common origin or basis of assessment, personal property being liable to taxation twice over, namely, once for the personal-property tax and once for income tax on the estimated income derived from the personal property. The following are the rates of state income tax at present in force:

Under 1,000 kroner, free of income tax.

	Per cent.
From 1,000 up to 4,000 kroner	2
From 4,000 up to 7,000 kroner	3
From 7,000 up to 10,000 kroner	4
Above 10,000 kroner	5

The total yield of the state income tax in the year ending March, 1904, was 5,421,956 kroner (£301,220). The total gross income of Norwegian state taxpayers for the same year was estimated at 248,225,609 kroner (£13,790,312). The total number of state income taxpayers in Norway in the year ending March, 1904, was 99,316, or 4.4 per cent of the total population.

Incomes under 1,000 kroner are free of state income tax. Above this amount a certain part of the income is always free of income tax. Persons liable to taxation are divided into four classes, according to the number of persons, beside the taxpayer's wife, to be supported, as follows: Class 1, those who have no one to support. This class includes companies and the like. Class 2, those who have from one to three persons to support. Class 3, those who have from four to six persons to support. Class 4, those who have seven or more persons to support. In the case of incomes exceeding 4,000 kroner per annum, the following amounts are exempted from paying state income tax: In class 1, 600 kroner; in class 2, 1,000 kroner; in class 3, 1,400 kroner; in class 4, 1,800 kroner.

The total national income is estimated at from 700,000,000 to 800,000,000 kroner (or from £30,888,888 to £44,444,444).

There is no system of differentiation within the income tax in Norway by which unearned income is taxed at a different rate from income from personal labor. Differentiation is, however, effected in practice by the operation of taxes on property and in a minor degree by death dues.

In the case of companies, the Norwegian income tax is levied at the source; but in the case of salaries, the tax is not deducted before payment. This tax is not assessed on a direct return by the individual taxpayer of his income from all sources, inasmuch as taxpayers make no returns on the subject; and incomes derived from companies, being leviable at the source, are omitted when assessing the individual taxpayer's income.

Assessments are made on the estimated income of the preceding year ending on the 30th of September last past. In cases of somewhat variable incomes an average of years can be taken as a basis of assessment.

The amount of a state income taxpayer's income from all sources, excepting that derived from companies, but including the probable income derived from personal property, is estimated by local municipal bodies appointed for the assessment of municipal taxes, and unconnected with the Government. The total income thus arrived at for purposes of municipal taxation is also used as the basis of assessment of state taxes. The same municipal body assesses the incomes of companies, which are taxed at the source, on the same principle as when assessing individual taxpayers' incomes. In making assessments on individuals, the municipal body calculates what they think to be his income. To this end they sometimes make inquiries of the taxpayer himself, or of other persons. The taxpayer is not bound to give information unless he wishes to do so. The assessments when made are published, and taxpayers are granted four weeks within which to appeal against the assessment.

On the whole, it is understood that the state system of income tax in Norway works satisfactorily.

Italy.

ROME, July 1, 1909.

1. There exists in Italy a system of income tax (tax on movables). It was established by the law of July 14, 1864, No. 1830. The income tax is not to be confounded with the house tax and land tax.

The revenue of a building is not to be considered as a source of income, but a special tax is imposed on it, viz, the "house tax." Likewise the land tax and not the "income tax" is imposed on the revenue of unbuilt ground or lands suitable for agricultural or other purposes. For instance, if "A's" only income is the sum of 800 lire, this being the amount of income he derives from a house, he does not pay the income tax, but only the "house tax." The same may be said in regard to income from land. The returns of the income tax are clearly specified in articles 3 and 4 of the "Testo Unico della legge." (Single law text.)

2. The Italian income tax actually but not nominally is graduated and is levied at different rates on both earned and unearned incomes.

3. It is levied at the source or is assessed on a direct return by the individual taxpayer of his income from all sources; that is to say, it is assessed on income wherever it may be found.

4. No fixed rule is prescribed for the tax collector to estimate the amount of the income either on estimated incomes for the current year, actual income for the preceding year, or an average of years. Availing himself of the authority conferred on him by paragraph 37 of the testo unico, he can make use of his discretionary powers by examining one year, or two, or an average of years. But with regard to limited and joint stock companies and other institutions or savings banks it is established in some cases that the assessment is to be made on the income of the preceding year.

5. Appeals are allowed. (Paragraphs 42, 46, 52, and 53 of the testo unico.)

6. No penalties are prescribed for incorrect or fraudulent returns.

7. As to the officials collecting these taxes: When the taxpayers' lists have been arranged and the assessments have been made definite, the collection of taxes is allotted by auction by the Government to private agents who acquire a right to attend to such a collection. This collection is intrusted to that private agent who offers to proceed with the various collecting operations with the least percentage. The percentage paid to the collector is divided among the taxpayers in proportion to the tax to be paid by them; therefore the Government collects the total amount of the income tax less the percentage allowed. The percentage offered by the agency that undertook the collection in the city of Rome was, at the last auction, 1¼ per cent.

The percentage is subject to alterations in different districts, according to the difficulties which are encountered in the collection.

8. The rate was originally, by the law of July 14, 1864 (No. 1830), fixed at lira 12 per cent, and successively was raised to lira 20 per cent.

9. The total amount of the income tax in the Kingdom of Italy was:

Category d	56,684,032.54
Total lira	766,198,218.03

From these five categories the Government derived the sum of 156,844,887.88 lira.

The difference between this amount and the one given above is made up by other sources of income tax which do not appear in the five categories; for instance, business tax, income tax on the payments made by the Government to contractors who perform contracts for the Government, etc.

LAND TAX, 1907.

General proceeds of this tax, 238,436,141.64 lira.

HOUSE TAX, 1907.

General proceeds of this tax, 586,335,877.91 lira.

11. The number of income-tax payees, including their families, for the year 1907 was:

	Lira.
Income tax	1,210,717
Land tax	6,703,935
House tax	3,162,143

12. Income from property or investment is taxed at a higher rate than income from personal labor. The Italian law distinguishes four categories (art. 52 of the regulations issued in consequence of the royal decree dated July 11, 1907, No. 560):

a1. Interests and premiums of loans of provinces and communities, bonds to bearer at fixed rate of interest (active bonds) of companies based on guaranties and subventions of the Government, and premiums of lotteries of all kinds. Government debt is not included, for reason that a tax on income from this source was practically excluded in consequence of the conversion of the debt.

a2. All other incomes depending on investment of capital, namely, perpetual annuities, mortgages or other bonds, loans, either by verbal or written private agreements or under the form of bill of exchange.

b. The incomes for the production of which capital and a man's work concur—that is to say, the exercise of every industry and commerce.

c. The incomes depending exclusively on a man's work, i. e., the exercise of a profession or trade.

d. Wages, pensions, and salaries in money or in kind paid by the provinces and communities, salaries in kind paid by the Government, and the daily wages of the day laborers in the government establishments.

1. The tax on the income of category a1 must be paid on the whole income.

2. The tax on the incomes of category a2 is not imposed on the whole income, but on thirty-fortieths of it.

3. The tax on the incomes of category b is imposed on twenty-fortieths of the income.

4. The tax on the incomes of category c is imposed on eighteen-fortieths of the income.

5. The tax on the income of category d is imposed on fifteen-fortieths of the income.

13. The exemptions from the payment of the income tax are as follows:

1. Diplomatic representatives of foreign countries.

2. Consular agents, when neither native of the Kingdom nor naturalized citizens, provided they do not carry on business in Italy, and provided reciprocal treatment is granted in the country which they represent.

3. Military men on the active list in the army and navy below the grade of officer, as to their military fees.

4. The income from the state of the Crown and of the members of the royal family.

5. The incomes of the mutual-benefit societies, provided that such incomes do not accrue from nominal bonds or bonds to bearer. (Arts. 7 and 8, Testo Unico, pp. 14–15.)

The small incomes of categories b, c, and d, which, after making the deductions spoken of above in each of these categories, do not amount to a taxable income of 400 lira, are exempted from taxation. Articles 55, 56, and 57 of law No. 1830, of July 14, 1844, give particulars respecting the determination of the assessable income of certain kinds of incomes above 400 lira, but below 800 lira.

14. The income tax is collected by means of direct deduction effected by the state or by means of nominal lists (ruoli). The incomes the tax upon which is collected by means of deduction are quoted in article 11 of the Testo Unico. (Annexed document "a".)

The Government deducts the tax to be paid by a state officer from his salary instead of paying him in full. The same system is adopted for the payment of taxes on the certificates of the Government. The other income taxes are collected by means of the compilation of lists.

These lists are registers containing the names of the income-tax payers to whom the system of deduction can not be applied, viz, lawyers, physicians, manufacturers, tradesmen, etc., who are inscribed in the list for a sum which is presumed to be their income.

15. Inheritance taxes exist in Italy as follows:

	Per cent lira.
1. Between ascendants and descendants	1.60
2. Between husband and wife	4.50
3. Between brothers and sisters	7.00
4. Between uncles and nephews	8.50
5. Between cousins (brothers' and sisters' sons)	12.00
6. Between other relations and collaterals as far as the tenth degree, inclusive	13.00
7. Beyond the tenth degree and between strangers	15.00
8. In favor of benevolent institutions under the control of the Government	5.00
9. In favor of other institutions	15.00

A kind of proportion has been recently fixed by law of January 23, 1902, No. 25, according to the extent of a succession. A table is attached to that law fixing the proportions, which are, of course, favorable to small inheritances and unfavorable to the large ones, viz, from a minimum of 0.66 per cent to a maximum of 19.46 per cent. (See annexed law "B".)

Spain.

MADRID, April 26, 1909.

Spain has no income tax of the kind which exists in England, but the "impuesto de utilidades," described in the inclosed memorandum, is a tax upon certain kinds of income or net profits, and may fairly be described as a partial or limited income tax.

Full particulars in regard to it will be found in the inclosed pamphlet, which contains the law of March 27, 1900, now in force, and the regulations of September 16, 1906, issued in pursuance of that law.

In the budget for last year (1908) this tax represented 134,000,000 out of a total estimated income of 1,040,000,000. It may therefore be said to produce about one-eighth of the total national income.

Statistics as to the number of persons affected by this tax are not available.

It will be noticed that the profits from labor are taxed at a lower rate than those from capital and than those from labor jointly with capital.

SPANISH INCOME TAX.

The form of limited income tax which exists in Spain is known as the tax "on profits of movable wealth" (contribucion sobre utilidades de la riqueza mobiliaria), or more shortly as the "tax on profits" (impuesto de utilidades).

Its rates are as follows:

TARIFF I.—PROFITS FROM PERSONAL WORK.

1. Ten per cent of total salaries or fees of directors, managers, etc., of banks, corporations, etc.; of trustees and managers of property or estates.

2. Five per cent of total salaries, fees, or commissions of employees of banks, corporations, etc.; of insurance agents, of actors, bullfighters, etc. (salaries under 1,500 pesetas exempt).

3. On pensioners of the State, Provinces, or municipalities, from 15 to 20 per cent of their pensions.

4. On civil servants, from 10 to 20 per cent of their salaries.

5. On officers of the army and navy, from 5 to 18 per cent of their pay.

6. On employees of the provincial councils and municipalities, from 6 to 16 per cent of their salaries.

7. On registrars of property, from 10 to 18 per cent of their salaries.

TARIFF II.—PROFITS FROM CAPITAL.

1. On the annual interest of the Spanish state securities (with a few exceptions), 20 per cent per annum.

2. On the dividends of banks of issue (i. e., of Bank of Spain), 5 per cent per annum.

3. On dividends of railways and other companies of all kinds, 3 per cent per annum (except mining dividends, which pay 2 per cent).

4. On the interest of the debts and bonds of provinces, municipalities, and of banks and companies of all sorts, 3 per cent per annum.

5. On the interest of mortgage notes and loans, 3 per cent per annum.

6. On the interest of loans without mortgage, 3 per cent per annum.

TARIFF III. PROFITS FROM LABOR JOINTLY WITH CAPITAL.

1. On net profits of banks of issue (i. e., Bank of Spain), 15 per cent per annum.

2. On net profits of joint stock companies (except mining companies), in addition to tax under Tariff II on dividends, and of those of tramways, etc., 12 per cent per annum.

3. On net profits of railways, shipping and canal companies, 7 per cent per annum.

4. On societies for production and consumption (except those of workingmen) and on net profits of cooperative credit associations, 6 per cent per annum.

5. On the premiums of fire and property insurance companies, 2 per cent per annum.

6. On the premiums of life, accident, and maritime insurance companies, one-half per cent per annum.

It will be seen that this tax is not like the English income tax based upon the total incomes declared by individual taxpayers, but that it is levied upon a limited number of sources of income, and only upon those in which the tax can easily be deducted at the source, i. e., can be retained by the State or by some company or public body which is made responsible for prompt and accurate payment.

This tax will probably be modified by the measures for financial reform recently introduced into the Cortes.

Canada.

OTTAWA, CANADA, June 7, 1909.

In Canada all income taxation is confined to municipalities. There is no national income-tax law and no provision for a graduated income tax.

The assessment act of Ontario, however, provides that all real property in the Province and all income derived either within or out of the Province by any person resident therein, or received in the Province by or on behalf of any person resident out of the same, shall be liable to taxation.

There is no system of differentiation in force by which unearned income is taxed at a higher rate than income from personal labor, but the annual income derived from personal earnings or from any pension, gratuity, or retiring allowance in respect of personal service, to the amount of $1,000, is exempt, where such person is a resident and householder in a city or town; to the amount of $700, where such person is a resident and householder in any other municipality; to the amount of $600, where such person is a resident, but not a householder, in a city or town; and to the amount of $400, where such person is a resident in any other municipality.

The income of any householder derived from investments is exempt when it does not exceed the sum of $300. Rent or other income derived from real estate, except interest on mortgages, is exempt.

Income derived from business is subject to a "business assessment," graded according to the nature of the business, but based upon assessed value of land occupied. In certain prescribed callings, however, the income is additionally assessed to the extent to which it exceeds the amount of the business assessment.

One section of the law provides that "it shall be the duty of every person assessable in any municipality to give all necessary information to the assessors to properly assess him," and "any person who, having been duly required to deliver or furnish any written statement or information * * * makes default in delivering or furnishing the same * * * shall incur a penalty of $100 and an additional penalty of $10 for each day during which default continues. Any person knowingly stating anything falsely in any such statement or in furnishing such information shall incur a penalty of $200."

Where the income is not a salary or other fixed amount capable of being estimated for the current year the income of such person for the purpose of assessment shall be taken to be not less than the amount of his income during the year ending on the 31st day of December then last past.

Appeals may be taken from the findings of the assessors to the court of revision and from the court of revision to the county judge.

The following statement gives the assessed value of the real property, business assessments, and taxable income, together with total amount of taxes, the average rate of taxes per head of population and taxation rate in mills on the dollar of assessed value for the year 1907, classified as rural (townships), urban (towns and incorporated villages), and cities.

RURAL.

Population, 1,045,640; real property, $587,619,115; business assessment, $4,622,690; taxable income, $2,832,831; total amount of taxes imposed for all purposes, $6,820,102; taxation per head of population, $6.52; and rate, 11.5 mills on each dollar of assessed value.

URBAN.

Population, 499,957; real property, $156,145,587; business assessment, $17,328,222; taxable income, $4,644,311; total amount of taxes imposed for all purposes, $4,203,766; taxation per head of population, $8.41; and rate, 23.6 mills on each dollar of assessed value.

CITIES (19).

Population, 654,766; real property, $321,518,357; business assessment, $40,230,783; taxable income, $14,039,181; total amount of taxes imposed for all purposes, $8,505,301; taxation per head of population, $12.99; and rate, 22.6 mills on each dollar of assessed value.

OTTAWA CITY, 1907.

Assessed population, 69,881; real property, $35,379,450; business assessment, $5,980,750; taxable income, $1,957,950; total taxes imposed for all purposes, $987,737; tax per capita, $14.13; and rate, 23.9 mills on each dollar of assessed value.

INHERITANCE TAXES.

Inheritance taxes are imposed in Ontario under the succession duty act (7 Edward VII, Cap., 10).

No duty is leviable on any estate the aggregate value of which does not exceed $10,000, nor on property devised for religious, charitable, or educational purposes to be carried out in Ontario, nor on property passing to a grandfather, grandmother, father, mother, husband, wife, child, daughter-in-law, or son-in-law of the deceased where the value of the property does not exceed $50,000.

Where the property exceeds $50,000 but does not exceed $200,000, the tax is graded from 1 per cent to 4 per cent, according to the value of the property; if it exceeds $200,000 value, the tax is 5 per cent, provided the property passes to the relatives above enumerated. These rates, however, are increased if more than $100,000 passes to any one individual. On property exceeding $10,000 value but under $450,000, the tax is graduated from 5 per cent to 9½ per cent; if the property exceeds $450,000, the tax is 10 per cent, provided the property passes to relatives of certain designated degrees of consanguinity. Property exceeding $10,000 value passing to other persons than those specially designated is subject to a tax of 10 per cent.

The net amount of revenue received by the Province of Ontario for the year 1907 under the succession duty act was $833,502.99.

New Zealand.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND, July 22, 1909.

(I am indebted for information to the Hon. George Fowlds, minister of education, and to Mr. P. Heyes, commissioner of taxes of the New Zealand government.)

I am sending under separate cover two copies of the "Land and income assessment act, 1908," the statute under which income tax is assessed and collected in this Dominion. I am sending also two copies of an excerpt from the Official Year Book, which contains a full description of the working and incidence of the income tax in New Zealand.

I am furnished by Mr. P. Heyes, commissioner of taxes in New Zealand, with information on the following points:

EARNED AND SO-CALLED "UNEARNED" INCOME.

"In New Zealand there is no income tax assessed on income from real property, owing to the land tax, which takes the place of income tax on income derived from land. The income of all joint stock companies is assessed at the rate of 1 shilling in the pound sterling, whereas a person or a firm is chargeable at the rate of 6 pence in the pound sterling on the first thousand of taxable income and 1 shilling in the pound sterling over and above this."

PAYMENT OF OFFICIALS.

"All officials engaged in the assessment and collection of income tax are paid fixed salaries as appropriated by Parliament. There is nothing approaching payment by results."

INHERITANCE TAXES.

These are assessed and collected by the stamp department at present. I am sending under separate cover two copies of the "Death duties act, 1908" and a form of statement giving a schedule of the duties.

The commissioner of taxes mentioned that "in 1905 the British Government called for full reports from all its representatives in its colonies, as well as its embassies abroad, concerning the incidence and working of the income taxes in force in different parts of the world, and these were published in full in the British Blue Book for 1905."

Saxony.

The direct taxation of incomes forms the chief source of revenue in Germany, and the whole method of securing accurate data on personal income is so admirably organized that the returns of the tax offices afford an exceptionally accurate view of the economic condition of the population and of the gradations of earning capacity.

The report of the tax office of Chemnitz for 1908 gives very detailed data on this subject, and their leading features are worthy of note, as they supply a tolerably fair idea of the range of incomes in one of the largest manufacturing cities of the Empire, and throw much light on the existing standards of life.

Out of a total population of 275,000 there were 111,381 whose annual income was over 400 marks ($95.20) and who were subject to tax. These were classified as follows:

	Persons.
Incomes between 400 and 800 marks	36,461
Incomes below 1,100 marks	25,941
Incomes below 1,600 marks	27,068
Incomes below 2,500 marks	11,625
Incomes below 3,400 marks	3,615
Incomes below 4,800 marks	2,693
Incomes below 6,300 marks	1,238
Incomes below 7,800 marks	671
Incomes below 10,000 marks	600
Incomes below 20,000 marks	848
Incomes below 30,000 marks	247
Incomes below 40,000 marks	112
Incomes below 50,000 marks	62
Incomes below 60,000 marks	43
Incomes below 70,000 marks	44
Incomes below 80,000 marks	20
Incomes below 90,000 marks	14
Incomes below 100,000 marks	12
Incomes below 150,000 marks	27
Incomes below 200,000 marks	17
Incomes below 300,000 marks	12
Incomes below 464,000 marks	8

A single person in the city has an income of over 1,000,000 marks.

The mark is worth 23.8 cents, but for the purpose of comparison it may roughly be estimated at 25 cents, and the above figures, divided by 4, give approximately the amount in dollars of the income in the various subdivisions.

Dividing the taxpayers into a few classes it will be seen that over one-half, viz, 62,402 have incomes of less than 1,100 marks, or $261.20. The number of those possessing incomes of less than 2,500 marks, or $595, is 100,695, or 90 per cent of the total number of taxpayers.

Seven thousand five hundred and forty-six persons have still higher incomes, but not exceeding 6,300 marks, or $1,500. In the next class, with a maximum of 10,000 marks, or $2,380, are 1,271 persons; in the following, reaching $11,900, are 1,269. The next class, ranging to $23,800, includes 133, while but 64 persons have a higher income than the last-mentioned figure.

The income tax in Chemnitz yielded $1,025,442 in 1908, an increase of $101,866 over 1907.

Panama.

[Law No. 32 of 1909 (February 16), by which is amplified and amended law 88 of 1904.]

The National Assembly of Panama decrees:

CHAPTER 1.

Taxes on real estate and movable property.

ARTICLE 1. The taxes mentioned in this chapter are imposed upon real estate and movable property, whatsoever may be the form in which it is found, in conformity with the following rates:

A. Five per cent on the probable annual income of city property.

B. Lots within the limits of towns shall be divided into three classes, which shall pay annually per square meter as follows:

"In the cities of Panama, Colon, and Bocas del Toro: The first-class, at the rate of B. 0.04; the second class, at the rate of B. 0.02; the third class, at the rate of B. 0.01."

[Ordinance No. 51 (July 8, 1908) respecting subsidiary personal work. The departmental assembly of Panama.]

CHAPTER 1.—General provisions.

ARTICLE 1. Personal service is a contribution imposed on all male residents of each municipal district between the ages of 18 and 70.

ART. 2. This contribution is of special application, and shall be entirely applied to the improvement of means of communication, to public works of the respective districts, and to the post-office service, the latter in those districts where it is indispensable.

ART. 3. The municipal corporations can not include in their budget of revenue a less sum for public works of the respective district than that noted in the budget of revenue as a product in money of the subsidiary contribution.

CHAPTER 2.—On the formation of the lists.

ART. 4. In each municipal district there shall be "a council of personal subsidiary work," whose duty it shall be to form a list of those obliged to render their personal service in accordance with article 1.

ART. 5. This council shall be composed of the following functionaries: The alcalde, who shall preside; the treasurer; and the municipal representative.

The secretary of the alcalde shall act as secretary.

ART. 7. For the qualification of the persons liable to pay the personal subsidiary tax, the council shall take into account that those pertaining to the first class are those who can contribute ten days' work per year. To the second class those who can contribute eight. To the third class those who can contribute six. To the fourth class those who can contribute four. To the fifth class those who can contribute three.

ART. 8. Those pertaining to the first class are the owners of haciendas, fincas, merchants, and, in general, all those who have an income or annual return from their work or occupation of $1,800. To the second class the owners of haciendas or fincas, merchants, and in general all those who have an annual income or return from their work or occupation of from $1,800 to $3,000. To the third class, those whose work or industry produces from $1,000 to $1,800. To the fourth class, those whose work, business, or industry produces $500 or more and under $1,000, and to the fifth class, those whose industry, occupation, or business produces less than $500 per year.

ART. 9. Those of the first, second, and third classes are under the obligation to pay for their services in money; those of the fourth and fifth classes in work, but they may also pay in money if they so desire.

Cuba.

MAY 12, 1909.

Properly speaking, there is no income tax in this Republic. A municipal tax, however, is laid upon the income value of property. This should rightly be considered a property tax, and differs from the similar tax in force generally throughout the United States in that it is imposed or assessed upon the actual income or the income value of property rather than on the assessed or sale valuation. Neither upon personality or the income therefrom is there any tax.

By an order issued by General Brooke, then governor-general of Cuba, on March 25, 1899, the taxes above described, theretofore collected by the State, were transferred to the municipalities, and the legislation now governing them is contained in the municipal law and the law of municipal taxation, which were prepared by the law advisory commission during the late intervention and were promulgated by Governor Magoon. Copies of these laws may be had upon application at the War Department.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, I regret that in the short time allotted to me I will not have time to make the discussion that I should like of the agricultural appropriation bill. I regret that in the consideration of the great agricultural interests of the people Members should apparently seem impressed with the idea that this is the proper time to discuss the question from a political standpoint rather than from the standpoint of agricultural science, and that on the part of some Members, especially on the majority side of the House, it should seem to be more important which party will be in control of the Nation than what disposition should be made of the funds supposed to be expended in the interests of the farmers of the United States. I am not in the habit of discussing questions from a political standpoint. I do not do that when I am standing before my people in my own district, and I do not want to fall into bad habits over here. If I were going to discuss this question from a political standpoint, I should be glad to call the attention of this House to the information which got into to-day's paper that the State Department, so far as our own Government is concerned, has surrendered to Germany upon the tariff question, and has decided not to press a just demand which has been made by the farmers of the United States to admit their products on equal terms with the rest of the nations of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the disposition of this money strictly from the standpoint of the farmer. The appropriation bills by the committees of this House are supposed to be based on recommendations made by the heads of the various departments which expend this money; and before any item carrying the expenditure of public moneys is recommended to this House, the department desiring the appropriation must show why they desire it and what public benefit will come from its expenditure. It is thus recognized that public money must be expended strictly for public purposes; and when any item has been carried in appropriation bills for some years, the official having charge of its expenditure must be prepared to demonstrate what benefits the public have derived from the use of such public funds. For this purpose estimates are submitted to these committees by the various officials, and sittings of the committee are held, at which time these estimates are explained to the satisfaction of the committee; and when an item of an appropriation bill is attacked, the chairman of that committee usually defends it by referring to the estimates and giving the explanations of the chief who requested the appropriation. Thus the committee stands between the Treasury and the public officials who are ever ambitious to secure the largest possible appropriation. This is the only way in which honest and economical government can be secured and the people protected against extravagance and undue taxation.

The distinguished chairman of the Agricultural Committee and his colleagues on that committee have reported a bill to this House, recommending its passage, carrying in the aggregate very large sums of money; and so far, Mr. Chairman, as these various items are based on estimates prepared by the Agricultural Department, I have no criticism to offer. I am a farmer myself, and have given my life to the study of agricultural science and the practical arts which grow out of that science, and in common with every other farmer of the United States, I honor and respect the present Secretary of the Agricultural Department. His long and successful administration of his duties are alike honorable to him as an officer, to his occupation as a farmer, to his political superiors who have had the good judgment to select and retain him in his position, and to our whole country, whose prosperity depends in so large a degree upon the agricultural wealth of our Nation. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers of our country have the highest respect for Secretary Wilson and his administration of the Agricultural Department of our Government; and any item in this appropriation which has the recommendation and indorsement of his department behind it should not be lightly challenged or attempted to be reduced or set aside. I have also high regard for the honorable chairman and members of this committee. No doubt but that they have brought great ability and industry to bear upon the work of preparing this measure; but, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of this House to one item in this bill carrying a very large sum of money which is not based on any request or recommendation of any official in that great department, and which is not justified by any report which has been written by the official charged with the expenditure of these large sums of money.

I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the item appropriating $309,590 for the purchase of miscellaneous seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants to be expended by the Bureau of Plant Industry in the Department of Agriculture. This is no new item, but has regularly appeared in every appropriation bill since 1865, until the total appropriation for this purpose has exceeded $5,500,000. And now, after a lapse of forty-five years, no Member of this House can produce a single report written within the past ten years by a member of the Agricultural Department defending this appropriation or asking that this work be continued. I hold in my hand the report of the hearings of the Agricultural Committee on the items of this bill, and not only is there not any statement of the benefits which come from the expenditure, but there is a distinct charge that the valuable work of the department, in one instance at least, has been halted and interfered with by an effort on the part of Congress to protect and extend this free distribution of seed. I read from the statements of Mr. Galloway, pages 69–70:

Mr. GALLOWAY. There is just one little matter that might be referred to, because the question might come up, and perhaps you would like to be informed on the subject. There was carried in the appropriation for seed for a number of years an item authorizing us to expend a certain portion of that money for forage-crop work. Under that we were carrying on quite successfully a number of projects which were yielding very satisfactory results.

The work was conducted in this fashion: We were securing, to the best of our knowledge, types of forage crops which might be sent into a community and placed in the hands of individual farmers who were acting with us and oftentimes cooperating with the stations and fixing a definite cropping system in that particular locality. We were spending about $30,000 in that work without any detriment whatever, without taking anything at all from the usual congressional fund for the ordinary congressional seed. Last year, in order to have that item set out more distinctly, we segregated it as a special thing. Some one, probably thinking that the congressional seed distribution was going to be invaded, cut it, and it went out, or was changed to $10,000 instead of $30,000.

There we have the expressed statement that a valuable line of investigation of the department relating to forage plants which was yielding satisfactory results was cut out and crippled for fear on the part of Members of Congress that the congressional seed distribution was going to be involved; so that, in this instance at least, this congressional distribution was a detriment to the work of the department and an injury to the agricultural interests of our country, and this statement was not challenged by any member of the committee, nor did any member of the committee have the courage to ask Doctor Galloway his opinion of the congressional seed distribution. A Member of this House did ask Doctor Galloway to express his opinion of the congressional seed distribution, and as the committee failed to take advantage of their opportunity to secure a later expression from him concerning the value of this expenditure, I will read his opinion as given in 1906, which is the only official statement that I can find having reference to this phase of the department's work:

As to the value of this miscellaneous distribution of garden and flower seeds, it is very difficult to state what it may be. There is little doubt in my mind that such distribution accomplishes more or less good. Very few reports are received, however, and in the nature of the case it is impossible for us to use any but standard varieties in the distribution, because the quantities required make it impossible to use the rarer sorts. When this distribution was first undertaken, a great many years ago, there is no doubt that it accomplished much good, because at that time the seed industry was not as thoroughly organized as it is to-day. The practice of ordering through the mails from seed catalogues was not then in vogue and it was extremely difficult for persons living in isolated localities to secure good garden seeds. This condition has changed, however, and to-day it is quite possible for anyone to buy garden seeds of the same varieties as we distribute.

There is here no claim that seed of new or superior merit is distributed; but, on the contrary, it is expressly stated that it is impossible for the department to use these valuable varieties. I shall give this House a list of the varieties now being distributed, which will amply sustain the doctor in that statement; but at the present moment I desire to call attention that the committee in recommending this expenditure to Congress is not acting on the suggestion of Doctor Galloway that conditions have changed so as to make this appropriation neither necessary nor economical. But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read another portion of the doctor's statement:

(C) THE INTRODUCTION AND DISSEMINATION OF NEW AND PROMISING SEEDS AND PLANTS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

This work, conducted as a part of the general seed and plant investigations, is one of the most important branches of the department. In the last five years a number of new things have been brought in and established as distinct industries.

I consider the work under the two last heads, namely, the securing and distributing of new or little-known varieties of field, forage, and other seeds, plants, etc., found in this country, and the securing and distribution of seeds and plants, etc., from foreign countries of the utmost importance to American agriculture. I believe that the total amount now authorized for the entire work could very well be devoted to these problems.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. With pleasure.

Mr. CANDLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to seed distribution?

Mr. MOSS. I will try to make my position plain before I get through.

Mr. CANDLER. Have you sent out your seed for this year?

Mr. MOSS. Before I get through I will take up that question and try to make my position plain to the gentleman.

Mr. CANDLER. If you have any to spare, I would like to have them.

Mr. MOSS. Here is a work, entirely separate and distinct from the congressional seed distribution, which the Doctor urges as of the utmost importance to American agriculture, which is giving splendid results and bringing wealth to the American people and honor and satisfaction to the Agricultural Department of our Government. This work not only has this emphatic indorsement but is one to which he says the total amount now authorized for the entire seed work could very well be devoted. In this position Doctor Galloway has the support of every farmer and friend of agricultural development in our country. Then, why did not the committee follow the Doctor's suggestion? Why not spend the money when it is bringing good results and stop the expenditure where it is bringing no practical results?

I desire to call particular attention to the fact that of all this vast quantity of seed—250 carloads—not a packet is sent out to any citizen on his personal request to the Department of Agriculture. I ask the chairman of this committee why it is that seeds which are purchased out of public funds, to be given away by public officials, that no citizen can obtain a packet except by the courtesy of his representative in Congress? I am told that on an average 20,000 citizens of the United States make application for seeds to the Department of Agriculture every year, and that they are refused. Why is it that they are not supplied? I shall read a printed form which is sent to every such applicant:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., —— ——.

Replying to your request for ———, I regret that the department is not in position to comply with the same.

Assuring you that we would be glad to meet your wishes in this matter if it were in our power to do so, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

B. T. GALLOWAY, Chief of Bureau.

The hearings of the committee show that the department prepares 250 carloads of seed for free distribution, and yet under these conditions the department writes to the taxpayer who has applied for a share in this distribution:

I regret that the department is not in a position to comply with the request, but assure you that we would be glad to meet your wishes in this matter if it were in our power to do so.

Why is it not in their power to comply with these requests? In any other department of our Government this condition would be considered a scandal.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. I would like to, but I see that I have only ten minutes left.

We have in this item a large appropriation of the people's money voted away by Congress, with the express stipulation that five-sixths of it shall be turned over to the Members who authorize this expenditure, to be sent out on their personal demand and without any accounting or report to any public authority. In the whole disbursement of this fund all the report that is required to be made by any authority is that the Secretary of Agriculture shall report the time, the place, the quantity, and the price of the seed purchased. Not even the varieties are demanded. And under this general provision I find that we are purchasing and distributing mustard seed. What a benefit it must be in these days of high-priced food products, when American workingmen for the first time in the history of our Republic are forming clubs and refusing to purchase plain articles of food on account of the exorbitant prices. What a favor, I repeat, it is that their Representative in Congress can send some of them mustard seed without cost to anybody except the taxpayer. And while the clerks in the Bureau of Plant Industry are busy making up packages of mustard seed the clerks in the Division of Publications are sending out circulars giving the latest scientific methods of eradicating mustard plants in grain fields. Bulletin No. 41 of the Agricultural Department says that mustard is a well-known and very widely distributed weed pest and one which is very difficult to eradicate when once introduced, but that it can be destroyed by spraying with a solution of iron sulphate.

I do not know which costs the taxpayer the greater sum, the bulletin or the packet of mustard seed—the poison or the antidote—but we have, in this instance, an example of how mutually helpful different departments of our Government may become if well organized; and while the one department is scattering the seed of this "well known and widely distributed weed pest" the other department is busy sending out instructions how the plants may be killed as soon as the seed germinates if unfortunately they should happen in a moment of carelessness to be sown. I shall request, Mr. Chairman, that a copy of this bulletin be included with every packet of mustard seed which is sent into my district, and if that is an act of extravagance you will have to make the most of it. And as a very large number of the Members of this House do not have the advantage of practical experience on the farm, I would be tempted to advise the members of this great committee to make this provision a condition precedent to the distribution of mustard seed if I did not possess confidential information that a reform is contemplated. I was told by a clerk connected with the congressional seed distribution that a former official in the service was very fond of mustard and, becoming enthusiastic in behalf of his favorite plant, had purchased a large quantity of mustard seed and began its distribution, and that the custom had since been continued. "I was born on the farm and therefore I am willing to admit," continued my informant, "that I would consider it an insult to be sent a packet of mustard seed, and when the present distribution is over, I'll be d—d if I will send out any more mustard seed." And in view of this very emphatic resolution, I will not insist that the committee act on my suggestion.

Under the distribution now in progress I have been notified that I had been allotted 20 packages of flower bulbs. As my wife does not devote all her time working in the garden, I could not use all these bulbs myself, and as there are more than 63,000 voters in my district, I was naturally puzzled to know why I was given 20 packages of bulbs to distribute among 63,000 voters. Assuming that there were 20 bulbs in each package, I found that I would have to divide each bulb into 157 pieces to make an equal distribution. So I appealed to the department for wisdom, and I asked the question, "Why am I given 20 packages of bulbs to distribute among 63,000 voters," and I was answered, "Because Congress ordered it done."

I was told further that these bulbs were grown in Holland, and were purchased there because they could not be grown in America. So it seems that in this instance we are not even patronizing American industry. The same may be said about much of the seed purchased, as considerable quantities of it is grown abroad. The only question asked is the price, and if seeds grown in foreign fields can be secured cheaper than those grown at home, the foreign-grown seeds are successful in the price contest. Of these 20 bulbs in each package I was told that some of them are exotic and will not reproduce themselves in our soil, and that when they once flower the plant dies. And yet the public funds are voted out and sent away to foreign lands to purchase these rare bulbs to be given away to the very select few in the inner circles of congressional favor, with the knowledge that with some of the bulbs so purchased the flower can only once be produced with no hope of the resurrection. Of what permanent advantage, Mr. Chairman, is the purchase of 20 packages of Dutch bulbs to the taxpayers of my district?

I have been informed that I would have to my credit 150 strawberry plants, and by computation I find that I could distribute 1 plant to every 420 voters of my district. Again, I asked the question, Why do you send 150 strawberry plants to be equally distributed among 63,000 voters? And I was answered, Because Congress wanted it done. I have considerable expert knowledge of strawberry growing and of the useful varieties of strawberries. And so I asked to be given the varieties which were being distributed. Here are some of the rare (?) plants which are available to be sent to the select circle of congressional friendship: Crescent, Sharpless, Michels Early, Warfield, Bubach, and other like varieties. Sending Crescent strawberry plants is an insult to any horticulturalist of education and experience. I do not know which is the greater imposition on the intelligence and forbearance of an educated citizenship—sending out Crescent and Sharpless strawberry plants or mustard seed. I would prefer to be sent the mustard seed, provided the bulletin was sent at the same time, as I would get equal value with less work. It is not necessary to give the entire list; there are none which can not be purchased in quantity at $2.50 per thousand plants; and many of these varieties are worthless as a gift.

I also received notice that I would be given 40 grapevines. That is one vine for every 1,570 voters of the district. And when I repeated the question, Why do you give me 1 grapevine for every 1,570 voters in my district? the same old answer came back, Because Congress wanted us to do so. And wishing to know what varieties of vines I might be able to send out to my very dearest and closest friends, I was told that I could secure vines of the Concord, Ive's Seedling, Delaware, Martha, or Moore's Early. Years ago, when we purchased our plants in quantity, these vines would have been furnished by any Indiana nurseryman for $3 per hundred vines. I can not give the wholesale price at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the time of the committee longer to show the common varieties of seed, bulbs, plants, and vines sent out; sufficient has been said to prove that this expenditure can not be justified on the ground that new and valuable seeds are furnished so that the whole country may ultimately share in the benefits which would come from any marked improvement of seeds. Nor can there be any claim that the Government is furnishing all the seed used by the people of the United States—but only a few varieties of seed to a very few citizens; so that all bear the expense and but few receive even the poor benefit which may come to those who are thus favored.

I called attention, Mr. Chairman, to the remarkable fact that this appropriation has been carried year after year without any recommendation in its favor by our Agricultural Department; and I desire to add that after a personal visit to the Bureau of Plant Industry I failed to find any subordinate officer who would speak a good word for it. I now desire to call attention to the fact that the farmers of the United States have placed themselves on record against it. I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the Indiana State Grange condemning this expenditure. This resolution was sent to me by Mr. F. J. S. Robinson, of Cloverland, Ind., a high official in that order, a neighbor and constituent of mine, with the statement that this resolution had been indorsed by the National Grange. I now present a similar resolution which has been adopted by the National Farmers' Congress. This resolution was handed me by the President of that organization, Joshua Strange, of Marion, Ind., who stated that it expressed his personal conviction in the matter, as well as the sense of the organization.

I now read:

Resolved, That we reaffirm our opposition to the system of seed distribution as now conducted by the Federal Government. We recommend that the money now expended for seed distribution be used for maintaining American seed and plant explorers in other countries, under direction of the United States Department of Agriculture, and we recommend the distribution of promising new varieties of seeds and plants among the agricultural experiment stations of the country for practical test. (Session of 1907.)

What higher authority can be given to show the attitude of farmers on this subject? The National Grange has a membership of more than 1,000,000 farmers, widely distributed over the United States; it is the oldest and most conservative organization of the agricultural population of our country, and its pronouncements carry the weight of authority. The National Farmers' Congress is a great organization, composed of delegates who pay their own expenses. They are a body of public-spirited citizens, in full sympathy with agricultural pursuits and intelligently devoted to the public welfare. I have in my possession a large number of letters from individual farmers, every one breathing opposition to this expenditure. I feel, Mr. Chairman, a sense of pride, as a farmer, in being permitted on the floor of this Congress to present these resolutions and letters; they are protests by farmers themselves against this extravagant and useless expenditure of public funds which has been made in their name and supposedly in their interest. My purpose is to clear the good name of the members of my calling against this prostitution of public moneys to private purposes and to serve notice on the membership of this House that if this item is carried in future appropriation bills it must be done with the full knowledge that agricultural intelligence has outgrown such petty statesmanship and condemns such petty favors.

Connected with this subject, Mr. Chairman, and partly caused by it, is the deficit in our postal department. Doctor Galloway estimates that the quantity of mail matter originating with the congressional seed distribution is 250 carloads. This vast tonnage is carried without the payment of postage, and thus constitutes a charge on the postal revenues. The President has recommended a raise in the rates on newspapers and magazine publications to meet the deficit in our Postal Department. There is also a strong hint about retrenchment in the rural delivery service; and it can not be denied that the Post-Office Department, during the past year, failed to establish as many new routes as the appropriation would have permitted the department to establish if the entire appropriation had been expended for that purpose. In the editorial columns of the Rural Free Delivery News of January, 1910, a statement is made that the department established only 492 new routes out of an appropriation ample to sustain 1,240 full 24-mile routes for one year. Here is a loss of 748 possible routes in one year. Any reduction in the extension of rural service or raise in the rates on second-class mail matter is in reality a tax on the rural population of our country. In both of these recommendations, if enacted into law, the loss will fall heavily on our rural population. We who are so fortunate as to live beyond the congested centers of population do not receive our daily papers by carriers, or go to the libraries to read our favorite magazines. They are now brought to our doors by the Post-Office Department at fair rates of postage. The publishers have met the situation with like good judgment, and any daily paper now published in the State of Indiana is delivered 313 days in the year for $3 per subscription along rural routes; and as a result, 85 per cent of the farmers in my district are readers of daily papers, and practically all of them readers of magazines. And if the majority of this Congress believe that these patrons will be willing to receive tons and tons of junk which is franked out free through the mails in exchange for higher rates on mail matter or anything halting in rural delivery service, you are acting on bad information or false conclusions.

I stand here pledged to all proper measures of economy. The country has general information of gross extravagance in the management of our governmental affairs; but we are under great obligations to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for his specific statement that it is easily possible without any crippling of efficiency in the public service to save $2,500,000 annually in our Treasury Department. And if it were not for the fact that this statement was made for the express purpose to secure an additional appropriation of $25,000 to hire other high-priced clerks to teach those we now are paying large salaries to conduct public business, I would feel hopeful that we are at the beginning of a much-needed reform. But I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am from Missouri on any proposition to save money which begins by hiring more men to do the same work. Why not dismiss the incompetent clerks you have employed and pay their salaries to these new men? We at least could not lose by this procedure. Out in Indiana we have ample experience in this particular brand of economy. We have employed one set of officials to do the work of others until there is no vacant room in the statehouse, and we have an army of officials going over the State teaching high-salaried officials to perform their legal duties. I am opposed to that plan of economy; and I suggest that it is a better policy to cut off expenses at the paymaster's desk. The people of the country are forming clubs pledged to reduce living expenses by refusing to spend money; and whatever may be the final result of their organization, it can not be denied that they have set our body a good example. If you wish to economize, the way to do it is to refuse to spend money; and I shall propose at the proper time an amendment to strike out this item from the bill.

I desire also, Mr. Chairman, to call brief attention to another expenditure of the Agricultural Department, which, while not authorized by the pending bill, is a work carried on by the Agricultural Department and paid for out of the Public Treasury. I refer to the meat-inspection service of the Bureau of Animal Industry. This work was authorized during the Roosevelt administration, and the recommendation of the President was that the expense should be paid by the industry benefited. The beef trust was powerful enough to defeat this good counsel of the President, and an appropriation of $3,000,000 a year was made on the Public Treasury, and the taxpayers have been paying the bills. Since that time our exports in meat products have been rapidly falling off, and the price of domestic meats have become so high that American citizens who crave meats and have been used to putting meat on their tables three times a day are organizing a boycott against the use of meat as a food product. I hope that the law which was so recently invoked against Gompers and his associates for refusing to purchase stoves and ranges will not be appealed to by the beef trust to compel the American people to pay the price. I am not a lawyer, but I can see but little distinction in the action of advising laboring people to refuse to spend their wages to buy meat and to advise them not to buy stoves; but I do know, Mr. Chairman, that at the present moment the American workingman is taxed to pay for the inspection of meats which wages will not permit him to eat or to set before his family and that such a charge can not be justified in right or in justice.

The President in his original message estimated that the charge could not exceed 8 cents per animal inspected, and if this charge were to be shifted from the taxpayer to the packer it would not reduce the margin of profit much below the rate of 35 per cent on the capital invested for a period of ten years, which report has been made by one of the great packing companies. What justification can be given for the Government making a microscopial examination of the food products of a private industry at public expense and certifying the results to the public so that these products can enter the market to a better advantage? Why not compel the packers to guarantee their own products and make them amenable to the criminal law for failure to obey the pure-food statutes? But whatever the substitute policy may be, I insist that the taxpayer should not be compelled to pay inspection charges on a product which monopoly has placed beyond his ability to purchase and consume. If you place this matter on the ground of protection to the public health, it is a pretty severe tax on the credulity of a man to believe that his health is endangered by a food product which he can not consume or place before his family as an article of food.

I have thus in an imperfect manner indicated in two definite instances where large sums of money may be saved to the Treasury and the burdens of government lightened to the people; and I have no doubt but that others better informed can cite many additional instances. I have refrained from discussing this question from a partisan standpoint, but I wish to call attention to the fact that the expenses of our Government during the Fiftieth Congress, under Harrison's administration, was, in round numbers, $794,000,000, while for the Sixtieth Congress, under Roosevelt, it had risen to $2,052,000,000.

This vast increase is not justified. In many instances these increased expenditures are no better than embezzlement of public funds under the protection of law. Special privilege should be stricken from the appropriation bills as well as from our general statutes—and the instances here cited are flagrant examples of special privilege—of spending public moneys contributed by all the people for the special benefit of a part of our people. I do not favor a cheese-paring policy which will halt the progress of our Nation. But, Mr. Chairman, economy in public expenditures is the broad road to progress. Our growth as a Nation is now halted in many directions, because our wasteful extravagance has emptied our Treasury. Our people are demanding the improvement of our rivers, the extension of rural free delivery, assistance to good road building, extension of our national-forest area, the better conservation of our national resources, a reduction in taxation on the necessary articles of living, and a resumption of that good old policy of our fathers—the gradual payment of our national debt. I would rather vote for these measures than to create new commissions to investigate why the rich are getting richer and the poor becoming poorer, and then sell bonds to pay the cost of the investigations.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, a word as to high prices. The President, in his annual message, says that the production of our farms have not kept pace with the increase in our population. I have had prepared for me by the Agricultural Department a statement of the per capita production of wheat and corn since the civil war. The results are as follows:

Year.	Bushels of wheat per capita.	Bushels of corn per capita.
1869	7.5	19.7
1879	9.2	35.0
1889	7.5	33.9
1899	8.7	35.1
1905	8.4	32.8
1906	8.8	34.9

Unfortunately for the years 1907 and 1908, the population of Hawaii and Alaska were included without adding their production. The result, of course, would be to lessen the per capita yield. The result is of no value for comparison, yet I will give it:

Year.	Bushels of wheat per capita.	Bushels of corn per capita.

It will be noticed that in wheat there has been no reduction in production per capita; nor has there been in corn. These are the two great bread grains, and high prices can not be charged to failure of our farms to produce the grain. There are no statistics of value, so far as live stock is concerned, except as taken from the number of animals marketed in the great live stock centers. As vast numbers of meat animals are slaughtered in private slaughterhouses and in smaller markets, these figures are worthless for comparison.

This fact is undeniably true, that we are now producing more—both grain and meat—than our own people can consume, and the table given shows that our per capita production in 1899, a period of low prices for food products, was practically the same as for the latest year in our table, 1906. To bring this point out clearer by comparison, I will place the two years together:

Year.	Bushels of wheat per capita.	Bushels of corn per capita.
1906	8.8	34.9

The man who can prove from these figures that prevailing high prices of food products are caused by production failing to keep pace with the growth in population is a better mathematician than I am. In his speech before the Manufacturers' Club at Philadelphia January 26, Secretary Wilson said: "It costs more to get the common necessities of life in the United States to-day than in any other country of the world." To explain this situation we have the general cause of a large increase per capita in our volume of money together with the special cause of monopoly.

A system of special privilege was overthrown in our Government by the civil war; and, however severe an indictment may be truthfully presented against the efforts of our civilization of that system, it must be conceded that it enthroned white women as queens of their households and protected the virtue of the womanhood of our race from barter and sale. The overthrow of that system was followed by the upbuilding of another system of special privilege, which has enhanced the power of money in our civilization; and in the long years which have passed since 1865 this system of privilege has gradually strengthened until it now threatens the home life of our Nation. It has caused a struggle for food among our people in the midst of plenty; it has reduced the savings of the workingman until it has robbed thousands of the hope to own a home in which to shelter his family; it has driven woman from the place which God gave her in the divine plane of creation into the ranks of those who work in shops to earn their daily bread. All this it has accomplished. And if we are to believe the terrible revelations made by those who have investigated the white-slave traffic, the wealth which would support the happy homes of those who create it, could they receive it, is being used by him who has possession without having given value received to purchase the virtue of women of his own race and to drive the white girl as well as the black into a slavery more terrible than the punishments of hell. A system which can work these results; which can produce from virtuous seed within the life of one generation, a civilization so foul that when its inner blackness was uncovered by a commission appointed by President Roosevelt to study the home life of our Nation, that the printed edition of that report was exhausted so quickly as to be open to the charge of having been suppressed; a system, I repeat, which can produce these results in the life of a free self-governing Nation would gather sufficient strength sooner or later to control the price of the food products of that Nation.

Mr. LAMB. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, on March 24, 1908, when the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department was pending, I made the following statement in a speech delivered on the floor of this House:

"During the Fifty-ninth Congress I was a member of the Agricultural Committee. I was placed there upon the recommendation of the minority leader, the Hon. John Sharp Williams, upon the written request and indorsement of 101 Democratic Members out of a total Democratic membership of 137 in that Congress. During my service upon that committee I discharged every duty devolving upon me with the utmost fidelity and in accordance with the conscientious convictions of my own heart. During that service I came in direct conflict with the seed trust, which sought to have the provision making appropriation for the seed stricken from the bill. It was stricken out in the committee, but was restored in the House upon an amendment offered by me. But for the adoption of my amendment, or one like it, no farmer in this whole country would have received a package of seed from his Member of Congress or Senator, and no lady in this broad land would have received a package of flower seed. While a member of the committee I also helped frame the meat-inspection law, which requires the beef trust to furnish the people pure and wholesome meats.

"I insisted that the bill be specific and effective. There were some provisions which Mr. LAMB of Virginia and Mr. BOWIE of Alabama and I thought ought to go into the bill to make it the more effective, but which were left out of the bill when reported from the committee. We therefore made a minority report, and two out of the three provisions we contended for were adopted by the House. I also favored appropriations, within constitutional limitations, for good roads. Since I have been in Congress I have done all I could in the interest of rural mail delivery and all the mail facilities for the people. In other words, without going further into details, as a member of the committee and as a Member of Congress I have favored such measures as I honestly believed would be most helpful to the farmers of this country, believing, as I do, that when you contribute to the prosperity of the farmers you at the same time help every other vocation, trade, calling, profession, and interest in the land. At the beginning of this session of Congress the Speaker, in the exercise of the power conferred upon him by the rules of this Republican House, removed me from the Agricultural Committee and assigned me to other committees, although I was again recommended for membership upon the Agricultural Committee by the minority leader [Mr. Williams], and although Mr. Williams vigorously protested against my removal and although I am assured my continuance upon the committee met the unanimous approval of all the Democratic Members. [Applause.]

"My removal from the committee, however, has not diminished my interest in the agricultural people nor cooled my ardor to labor for their welfare. The Speaker had the power to take me off the committee, but, thank God, he has not the power to prevent me from being heard upon this floor. [Applause.] The only power which could thus close the door of opportunity to me is that exercised by the patriotic, chivalrous, noble, and loyal Mississippians who live in my district; and until they demand my retirement I shall continue to work earnestly and faithfully for them and to speak out boldly for their interests and the interests of the people of my beloved country. [Applause.] I am a candidate for reelection, and to my people I shall appeal for their indorsement and a vindication of my record at the ballot box, and I have no doubt as to what the result will be." [Applause.]

After I made this statement I understood that my advocacy of the Appalachian Forest Reserve and for increased appropriations for agricultural schools were other matters which militated against me and contributed in some degree to bringing about my removal from the Committee on Agriculture. Therefore on all of the above-mentioned issues, as well as upon my whole record in Congress, I was a candidate for reelection to this the Sixty-first Congress, and did appeal to my people for their indorsement and a vindication of my record at the ballot box, and in every speech which I made during the campaign I presented and argued the above-mentioned questions especially, and presented my record and asked my constituents to give me their indorsement in no uncertain tones [applause], and in the primary election which followed I received the decisive majority of 2,814, being the largest majority I have ever received; carried 109 out of 134 voting precincts and 8 out of 9 counties, losing only the home county of my distinguished and able opponent by the small margin of only 20 votes. [Applause.] Therefore I know I am in Congress with my course on the above-mentioned matters, as well as my whole record, fully indorsed and approved by a large majority of my constituents, and to one and all of the people of my district I am profoundly grateful and thankful. I believed then, and certainly have reason to know now, that in what I have done and said as their Representative in Congress I voiced their sentiments and carried out their wishes and views, and in doing so I was then, and am now, happy and content, for I much prefer to truly and honestly represent my people and have their confidence, esteem, and approval than to misrepresent them to gain favor here, if I could thereby have the approval of the Speaker of this House with the highest committee assignments at his disposal. [Applause.] His power seems, from the signs of the times, to be gradually slipping away from him and growing less, and may God speed the day when a Democrat will take his place, when the majority on that side of the House, under a righteous public opinion, may fade away and this side of the House increase, and thereby secure the election of a Democratic Speaker, who, I trust, will be a true representative of the American people and a man who will look after their interests and their welfare; and I know of no man in whom we can place greater confidence or who would be more acceptable than the minority leader, Hon. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I shall faithfully, efficientiy, honestly, and promptly represent and serve my people so long as they honor me with their commission, and I trust thereby to continue to merit and receive their approval, commendation, and confidence. My conception of the duties of a Representative is expressed in the word "Representative." I believe a Member of Congress should in deed and in truth represent his people; should represent their views, their wishes, their sentiments, and their opinions, and thereby subserve their best interests. When he can not conscientiously do so, he should have the manhood and courage to retire. Since I have been in Congress I have cast every vote as I believed in my heart a majority of my people would vote themselves if present here to do so. I have not uttered a word or sentiment but what I have earnestly believed I was voicing their sentiments and expressing their views. I may have made mistakes, but if so, my God knows it was an "error of the head and not of the heart" [applause] and so long as I have the honor to remain the Representative of the first district of Mississippi I shall continue to work and vote and speak for those things which I believe to be for the interest of all the people I represent and the glory of the country. [Applause.]

I was not elected to Congress to represent the Speaker of this House or his views. He could not be elected from my district if he lived there, because my people do not agree with his policies or his views. [Applause.] Therefore I do not represent the views of the Speaker, but represent the views and the interests and look after the welfare and the prosperity of my people as best I can. They believed I had the ability and courage to do so, and they had confidence in me, and therefore they conferred upon me their commission. So I say to you frankly upon the floor of this House to-day that I will be removed from every committee at the disposal of the Speaker before I will misrepresent or prove false to my people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

If by reason of faithful service to the people I receive the disapproval of the powers that be on this floor, I consider it a compliment, and with truth, honesty, and faithfulness as my guiding stars, I shall press onward, conscious of having done my full duty to my people and to the country. I do not belong to any cliques, rings, machines, or combinations here or elsewhere, and I never have and never will "wear any man's collar." [Loud applause.] I am the servant of all the people in my district and anxious at all times to be useful to them, and I am never happier than when I am doing something for them. [Applause.]

I never get greater pleasure out of life than when I am able to scatter sunshine into the pathway of somebody else. [Applause.]

The smallest soul in all the world is possessed by the man who is so full of egotism that he is wrapped up in himself, while the man with the greatest soul in all the universe is the one who continually, like the "Man of Galilee," seeks to help and bless somebody else and contribute to the prosperity and happiness of others. One of my sins when I was removed from this great committee—and I consider it one of the greatest committees of this House—was that I was in favor of increased appropriations for agricultural schools. I wish there was a school accessible to every child in this country. I want to educate the youth of this great Republic. A man could not bring greater blessings to humanity than to devise means to cultivate the minds of the youth of this Nation; open the door to them to knowledge and let them learn, not only about the Nation and the country, but let them study the mysteries of the past and the problems of the present as they unfold, as we travel forward in the pathway of the future. Let them realize what a great country we possess and create patriotism in their hearts, and it will make them better citizens and more useful by reason of the fact that they have been permitted to acquire knowledge which may be furnished to them in the schools of the country. [Applause.] I believe that there is nothing more important than the cultivation of the mind except the salvation of the eternal soul. [Applause.] As so I believe that we should prepare a way to cultivate the mind and teach, as best we can, the youth of the country the benefits and joys which come from the acquisition of knowledge, and the good mothers, I am sure, will impress the importance of the eternal destiny of the soul. And because I believe in that doctrine and because I believed in these principles I did stand for an increased appropriation for the agricultural schools of the country, because I wanted to help the cause and benefit the youth, and I stand here to-day voicing the same setiment. I have heard that it was the policy which I advocated that also contributed to take me from the Agricultural Committee.

I want to tell you what my policy was. My policy on that committee was to develop and build up all the country. Especially did I have in view the development of the agricultural interests of this country, because I believe in developing those interests we help every trade and calling and profession in this broad land. I collected year after year the appropriations which were made for the other departments of the Government. I contrasted those appropriations with the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and I showed that the Government was doing many, many times more for brass buttons and for show and for armament of warfare than it was doing for the peaceful pursuits of this country, in helping the agricultural interests of the land, and that may have been another reason why I was in disfavor. Mr. Chairman, it is shown in the statistics which I submitted on a former occasion that the average annual appropriations for the War and Navy departments for ten years was, in round numbers, $245,000,000, which is more than has been appropriated for the whole Agricultural Department for the sixty-nine years of its existence. [Applause.] Just think of that. Is it just to thus treat a great department, representing the marvelous agricultural interests of this country? The farmers of America produced this year crops valued at $8,760,000,000, and in the pending bill only $13,417,136 is appropriated to foster and develop all this great industry. Because I believed in larger appropriations and, as a consequence, greater development I was arbitrarily stood aside, and this year the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], than whom the farmers never had a better friend or more zealous advocate, suffered the same fate. It is well known here that in committee and on the floor the gentleman from Alabama was always alert, active, and energetic in looking after every interest of the farmers of this country; but faithful service to them seems to be a crime to be punished here rather than a virtue to be recognized. If Mr. HEFLIN feels like I do—and I am sure he does—he is willing, if need be, to suffer for a righteous cause, for right is mighty and will yet prevail. When the proper time is reached in the consideration of this bill, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON], who is a farmer himself and has suffered from the boll weevil, and therefore has knowledge of present conditions, will move to increase the appropriation for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the boll weevil from $215,000 to $500,000. This is asked for by the farmers of Mississippi in a unanimous resolution passed by the Farmers' Cooperative and Educational Union, and I hope his amendment when offered will prevail.

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill to prevent dealing in cotton futures, farm products, and, in fact, all kinds of future dealing. The people of this country, and especially the farmers, desire legislation on this subject to put an end to this unwholesome and pernicious speculation. If my bill can not pass, I will cheerfully and gladly support the Henry bill, or any other bill which will accomplish the end desired. I appeal to the membership of this House to get together and give the people relief from this great evil. Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest blessings and benefits ever bestowed upon the rural sections of our country is rural delivery of the mails. Now, add to this good roads and the whole country will call you blessed. As was well said by Senator BANKHEAD in a speech in the Senate, when speaking on this subject:

> Another reason for national aid is to be found in the fact that nearly all of the great appropriations made by Congress are for projects that do not benefit the rural districts. The shipping interests have had the rivers and harbors improved to expedite their business; the cities have been supplied, at a cost of $300,000,000, with post-offices and custom-houses; the railroads have received large appropriations and have made use of the credit of the Government; millions collected from the people have been loaned to the banks without interest, and iron masters have depended upon the Government to construct great locks and dams for facilitating the assembling of materials at cheap rates for making iron. The tariff laws have been shaped to benefit the manufacturers, but none of them are intended to benefit the great American farmer.

May I not appeal to your patriotism to consider this great question, and if you really want to do something to benefit all the people everywhere, spend some of the millions yearly appropriated in aiding the construction of good roads. The average cost of hauling over the public roads is 25 cents per ton per mile, and the average haul is 8 miles. Good roads will reduce the cost to 10 cents per mile, which would reduce the cost of transportation to the farmers more than half and save them every year enormous sums of money in the aggregate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. I regret to announce that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my time has expired, because I desired to pursue this interesting subject further; permit me, however, to sincerely thank the membership of the House for their very kind attention. [General applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE].

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, the failure or partial failure of a cotton crop is not a local matter in so far as the ultimate results are concerned, but, in the end, a national calamity.

Hence, in the same proportion, a substantial reduction of the total yield of cotton in the United States in this year and those to come, thus depriving the Nation of its main article of clothing, is a misfortune which falls upon the consumer as much as upon the producer of the article. So, the decrease in the amount of cotton produced in 1909, amounting to fully 1,500,000 bales below that of the preceding year, in view of the constantly increasing demand for raw cotton, is causing much study to be given to the subject.

The cause for this decrease should merit the attention of every Member of this body, for there is not a person in our entire land who does not use cotton in some form. I can not recall any other article so universally used as is this.

One of the best authorities holds that the demand for raw cotton doubles every twenty-two years; that, estimating 13,000,000 bales as a minimum supply on the part of the United States for the world's clothing at the present time, you may go back twenty-two years and you will find that a little more than 6,000,000 bales was sufficient in 1888 and that in 1866 3,000,000 bales were sufficient to supply the demand upon the American cotton fields, while about the year 1844 the exigencies of the trade were met with 1,500,000 bales. Hence, if history repeats itself, we must look forward to the world requiring 26,000,000 bales in 1932 and 52,000,000 bales in 1954. These figures are not idle guesswork by an inexperienced layman, but are the result of deep study of that question by one of the most industrious and intelligent men connected with the Agricultural Department of the United States, Dr. Seaman A. Knapp.

And even should we refuse to accept these estimates for the future requirements of cotton, still, proceeding upon the conservative theory that history will repeat itself, at least to the extent of showing a constantly increasing demand each year, however moderate that increase may be, it behooves us to look seriously into the matter of the decrease in our cotton yield, for it may be safely asserted that the cotton crop of 1909 is 1,500,000 bales short of what the world requires.

To the reasons for this shortage in yield in the face of such an increasing demand for cotton I shall now address my remarks. And if this cause is shown to be one that would logically come within the usual supervision of the Department of Agriculture in order that same be removed, then the appropriation for that purpose should be a liberal one. To anyone who has made any study of the subject the main cause, if not the entire cause (though there may have been minor ones which have in a small degree contributed thereto), of the large failures within a certain radius in the cotton belt is the rapid spreading of the cotton boll weevil, the enormous ravages of which have attracted the attention of every student of agriculture. Such proportions has the damage wrought by this insect reached that the Secretary of Agriculture in his recent report to the President has given much space to the consideration of this topic. He estimates that the crop for 1908, for instance, was damaged nearly $30,000,000, and that while all of this amount was not due entirely to the ravages of the weevil, that the most of it was the result of same. In connection with this the Secretary uses the following language:

> The great loss in Louisiana is a verification of the prediction made for several years, and it indicates the importance of means of control adapted to such conditions as are found in Louisiana and other States that will soon be invaded by the weevil.

Further on the Secretary, in his report, states:

> The subject is an extremely complicated one and will require additional work for several years.

On page 109 the Secretary uses this language:

> Special studies have been made in the Mississippi Delta, where conditions differ to a considerable degree from those in any other region invaded by the weevil. The heavy precipitation, presence of heavy timber, mild winters, and other features combine to make the boll weevil problem more serious than it has been elsewhere, and special work has been carried on for the purpose of ascertaining any change in the life history of the weevil due to these differing conditions.

On page 88 of said report the Secretary says:

> Any observer of farm crops in the United States has noticed that a few farmers secure a good yield almost every year regardless of seasons or pests, while the great majority of farmers make only moderate returns the best seasons, and between these secure only partial yields or have total failures. The advent of the boll weevil in the cotton States accentuated this situation and enormously multiplied the failures until a total wreckage of that great fiber industry was threatened.

The cotton boll weevil is not a native of the United States. Authorities tell us that its original home was in the plateau region of Mexico or Central America. Previous to 1892 the insect had spread through Mexico, but little is known regarding the extent or rapidity of this dispersion. It is said that it was the cause of the abandonment of cotton in certain regions there. About 1892 the boll weevil crossed the Rio Grande near Brownsville, Tex.

We learn from such authorities as W. D. Hunter and W. E. Hinds, and W. W. Yothers, of the Bureau of Entomology, that there is very little certainty regarding the history of the Mexican cotton boll weevil before its presence in Texas came to the attention of the Bureau of Entomology in 1894. The species was described by Boheman in 1843 from specimens received from Vera Cruz, and it was recorded by Suffrian in 1871 as occurring at Cardenas and San Cristobal, in Cuba. Written documents in the archives at Monclova, in the State of Coahuila, Mexico, indicate that the cultivation of cotton was practically abandoned in the vicinity of that town about the year 1848, or at least that some insect caused great fears that it would be necessary to abandon the cultivation of cotton. A rather careful investigation of the records makes it by no means clear that the insect was the boll weevil, although there is a rather firmly embedded popular notion in Mexico, as well as in the southern United States, that the damage must have been perpetrated by that species.

Messrs. Hunter and Hinds further state:

From the time of the note by Suffrian regarding the occurrence of the weevil in Cuba in 1871 up to 1885, there has been found no published record concerning it. In 1885, however, C. V. Riley, then entomologist of the Department of Agriculture, published in the report of the commissioner a very brief note to the effect that Anthonomus grandis had been reared in the department from dwarfed cotton bolls sent by Dr. Edward Palmer from northern Mexico.

By 1894 it had spread to a half dozen counties in southern Texas and was brought to the attention of the Bureau of Entomology of the United States. A preliminary examination by Messrs. Howard and Townsend, of that bureau, showed the enormous capacity for damage by the pest.

Subsequent events have verified in every way the predictions that were made at the time, when the insect had not attracted and considerable amount of attention in the South. Since 1894 the weevil has extended its range annually from 40 to 70 miles. During the first ten years after its advent into this country, the annual rate of spread was 5,640 square miles. Since 1901 the annual increase in the infested territory has averaged 26,880.09 miles, but in one exceptional season, namely, 1904, 51,500 square miles became infested. The total area now infested may be conservatively stated as a quarter of a million square miles, and within these limits nearly 40 per cent of the cotton acreage of the United States may be found.

These figures do not refer to the area in cotton, as in many parts of the infested territory the area devoted to cotton is much less than 10 per cent of the total area. At the present time the weevil is found more or less extensively in five States—Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. In Mississippi more than 30 counties are now infested; in Arkansas, 28; in Oklahoma, about one-fifth of the State; and in Texas and Louisiana, practically the entire cotton belt.

The average yield per acre in Texas from 1893 to 1901 (when the weevil had not done damage sufficient to affect the general production) was 0.40 of a bale. The average from 1902 to 1907 was 0.35 of a bale. By comparing these periods we have a reasonably accurate basis for estimating the damage the insect has done. The difference is 0.05 of a bale, or 25 pounds of lint, per acre each year. Even taking an average price of 10 cents per pound (it has recently been as high as 15 cents), this means an annual loss of at least $2.25 per acre which has been sustained by the cotton planters of Texas. Assuming that the Texas acreage has averaged 10,000,000, the total loss for the State has annually been $22,500,000.

Undoubtedly for several years—

Says Mr. W. D. Hunter in a recent publication, and from whose work the foregoing statistics were taken by me—the boll weevil has caused a loss of about 400,000 bales of cotton annually. Although farmers in older regions in many cases are increasing their production, there is loss in the newly infested regions which offsets that gain. A conservative estimate shows that since the weevil has invaded this country it has caused a loss of 2,550,000 bales of cotton, at a value of about $125,000,000.

And in making up this estimate the loss to the crop of 1909 is not included.

On page 8 of his recent work Mr. Hunter says:

Reference has been made to the greater damage inflicted in moist regions and where the shelter for hibernation is best. The records of the Weather Bureau show that the annual precipitation increases very rapidly from the west to the east in the cotton belt. This is especially the case during the early growing season of cotton, namely, April, May, and June. The precipitation in the greater part of the cotton-producing area in Texas is normally about 40 inches. In Louisiana, Mississippi, and the eastern States of the cotton belt it is more than 50 inches, and sometimes exceeds 60 inches. The records that have been kept in Texas show that the damage has always been greatest in wet seasons and that the insect has affected land values most where the general conditions approach those of the eastern part of the cotton belt. Without the assistance that is furnished by climatic conditions, especially dry weather during the spring, the farmers of Texas would not have been by any means as successful in producing cotton during the last few years as they have. The system of control increases greatly in effectiveness when assisted by weather conditions. Fortunately in Texas this assistance is given under normal conditions. When this assistance is above the normal, as in 1904 and 1906, the crops will be exceedingly large.

On the other hand, it is clear that the problem of control of the boll weevil will be more difficult as the pest continues its invasion of the cotton belt. It can not be considered, therefore, that the problem is as yet completely solved. Better means of control must be devised for the region that is becoming invaded, and, if possible, means must be devised that will reduce the enormous loss that is suffered, especially during unfavorable seasons, in Texas. The principal work of the Bureau of Entomology at this time is in attempting to devise means for this requisite additional control.

In his latest work on the subject, on October 18, 1909, Mr. Hunter says:

The cotton boll weevil is now causing a damage in the United States each year of at least $25,000,000.

While in a former work the same authority, in reference to the cotton boll weevil, writes:

The pest is undoubtedly the most serious menace that the cotton planters of the South have ever been compelled to face, if not, indeed, the most serious danger that ever threatened any agricultural industry.

It has been stated by the highest authority, and it is now accepted by all who have made any study of the question, that the cotton boll weevil will soon spread over the entire cotton-producing territory of the United States. Therefore, as any serious impairment of the cotton crop is a national calamity, it is the duty of the Department of Agriculture to continue vigorous action, and it is the duty of Congress to lend all necessary aid in a financial way to that department for such purpose. It has been stated in substance on this floor that, in reference to a great pursuit like agriculture, in which the entire country has so vital an interest, it is the right and duty of the National Government to make investigation relating to the fundamental principles which underlie the success and productiveness of that pursuit. Hence, if this principle be correct, it is also the duty of the Government, in my opinion, to diffuse and disseminate in a practical and effective manner the knowledge obtained as a result of such investigations. The mere possession of useful knowledge by an individual is of little value to the world unless that knowledge is diffused among and understood by others. Unless it is disseminated by its possessor among his fellow-men, it is of little, if any value, to the world at large. The possession of knowledge by a single individual or set of individuals is one thing, its diffusion among those whom it benefits another, and a mode should be adopted which will most successfully and quickly accomplish this dissemination.

Hence it matters little if the Bureau of Entomology, by its deep and careful study of the life history of the boll weevil, has found a method under which cotton can be grown under boll-weevil conditions unless that method is successfully diffused among the actual growers of cotton. The Bureau of Entomology, giving the results of its study of the life history of this insect to the Bureau of Plant Industry, thereby enabling the latter to evolve a system of cotton culture which will be successful in the boll-weevil territory, will be of no avail in obtaining results unless the Bureau of Plant Industry is given the opportunity to diffuse and disseminate its knowledge in a way that will cause the ready acceptance of that method by the actual cotton growers.

Proceeding upon these premises, the next question is, How can this system of culture, an entirely new one, involving the introduction of many innovations, if not totally different system in the culture of cotton, be presented to the cotton grower so that he will accept and believe in it? Can it be done by sending the grower a bulletin by mail? Remember that the farmer does not readily take to innovations. He knows from past experience how to cultivate the particular crop with which he has had that experience, and he is not inclined to overturn the practical experience and teachings of a lifetime merely upon the perusal of the pamphlet of 20 pages, the author of which he does not know and as to whose interest in his welfare he may hold some doubt.

It would be the same with reference to the grower of corn in the district of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. SCOTT] were some hitherto unknown insect to appear in Douglas or Linn counties and destroy the corn crop in relatively the same proportions as the boll weevil has done cotton in the South.

The way, and only way, by which you can revolutionize the method of culture of any farm product so that the farmer will take hold of and accept the new theory within a reasonable length of time and completely reverse or change his former methods of cultivation is by the actual, practical, demonstration in the immediate vicinity of the farmer, that in the face of altered conditions the new method is the way, and the only way, by which that product can be produced.

Realizing the truth of this principle, the Department of Agriculture has established the farmers' cooperative demonstration work, which has been in existence since 1904, and while the activities of this branch of the Bureau of Plant Industry are not confined to the cultivation of any one product, it has been peculiarly successful in the boll-weevil section of the cotton belt, demonstrating in every community wherein the weevil has recently appeared, and right under the eye of the neighboring cotton growers, how the new method of cotton culture is the only one by which the staple can be grown under the altered conditions.

In his bulletin on the subject, Doctor Knapp states that the effect of a field demonstration is immediate and positive and reaches all classes, and in concluding his discusion of the subject he uses this language:

It has been proved by the cooperative demonstration work that by following the instructions of the Bureau of Plant Industry a good crop of cotton can be raised in the worst-infested boll-weevil districts and despite the ravages of this pest. It is possible that the future may discover some better method of meeting the boll-weevil problem, but experience has shown that the method outlined is the only safe one at present. The boll weevil has now (1908) covered a large portion of Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and several counties in Mississippi. It is annually invading new territory, with a column 600 miles long and in numbers sufficient to cover every stalk of cotton to a width of 30 miles. A cotton crop can be produced despite the boll weevil, and the sooner American farmers face the situation the better it will be for all concerned. To demonstrate the truth of this theory is one object of the farmers' cooperative demonstration work.

A peculiar feature about this pest is that it is absolutely immune from total eradication in so far as at present known. Once having reached a particular territory, it has never been known to leave it untenanted by its species. With most agricultural insect pests, if not all of them, the history has been one of only temporary activity in any one locality; then it either dies out altogether, is eradicated by the use of poison, or passes on without permanent colonization; but to sum up the duration of occupancy by this insect when it reaches a given territory is best expressed in the words: Once the weevil, always the weevil.

While it is not to be understood that the necessity for the actual demonstration work on the part of the Government in every locality where the weevil is found exists for all times to come, yet it is a fact that the work should be begun in each locality immediately upon the advent of the weevil, and it should be kept up in that same locality for several seasons; and as the weevil is not only advancing eastward, but also northward and southward toward the uttermost limits of the cotton belt, the large ratio of increase each year shows the necessity for the large expansion of the demonstration work.

Hence to carry out this system now being so intelligently conducted by the special agent in charge of the demonstration work, as well as to assist the Bureau of Entomology in continuing this study concerning the life history of this insect, a liberal appropriation by the National Government should be forthcoming.

I will now address my remarks to some facts showing the ravages of this pest which have come within my own observation. In the parish of Pointe Coupee, in Louisiana, which is immediately west of that in which I reside, and wherein the boll weevil first entered the district which I have the honor to represent, there were produced in the year 1904—a banner year in cotton production—just prior to the advent of the weevil into that parish, 58,597 bales of cotton; in the last year, 1909, only 3,348 bales. In the parish of West Feliciana, where I reside, the total production for 1904 was 22,004 bales; in 1909, only 1,336 bales. In the parish of East Feliciana—contiguous to the latter and immediately eastward thereto—the production in 1904 was 35,707 bales; in 1909, only 5,607 bales. Continuing on eastward through the district, the next parish, St. Helena, produced 10,577 bales in 1904; and in 1909 only 7,491 bales; while the parishes of East Baton Rouge and Livingston, lying to the southward of the last three named, produced, in 1904, 37,079 bales and 8,197 bales, respectively, as against 7,491 bales and 2,500 bales, respectively, in 1909. The remainder of the cotton parishes in the district were all affected in the same degree proportionally to the length of time elapsing since the advent of the weevil into each parish, respectively. In giving the production for 1909 in the above localities I should state that I took the census reports down to December 13, 1909, being the latest available. Will state, however, that in a weevil-infested territory practically all of the cotton is ginned by December 13.

A storm in September, 1909, did some little damage to the cotton in the section mentioned, though same was infinitesimal in comparison with the havoc wrought by the weevil, to which latter may be attributed this enormous difference in production.

Utter demoralization has followed the entrance of the weevil into the section mentioned, and our farmers are skeptical of all suggestions, though this last I feel is only temporary, and the splendid work of Doctor Knapp and of Mr. J. A. Evans and others connected with the Farmers' Cooperative Demonstration Work, and of Mr. Wilmore Newell, of the Louisiana Crop Pest Commission, is beginning to produce good results just as in the more western section of the cotton belt, whence the weevil has been gradually advancing eastward.

While same has not come within my immediate observation, I am reliably informed that like conditions of demoralization prevail in the southwestern counties of Mississippi as a result of the recent advent of this insect into that territory.

Mr. Chairman, the agricultural interests of our country are not, in my opinion, receiving sufficient encouragement at the hands of the National Government. We hear much upon this floor in behalf of innumerable projects, projects calling for the appropriation of millions of dollars, but all too little do we hear on behalf of the development of our agricultural resources. Congress last year appropriated for all purposes over a billion dollars for governmental expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, but of this vast sum only $12,995,036 for agriculture. And yet the agricultural crops raised in the year 1909 were worth $8,760,000,000.

The total amount carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture, which we have under discussion, is $13,417,136. We hear much of the increased cost of living in the Nation. Resolutions have been introduced in this House and in the Senate looking toward an inquiry into the causes thereof, and while the reasons for the increased cost of other commodities may be numerous and diverse there is one and only one main cause for the high price of raw cotton, and that is the large decrease in the supply due to the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

And yet for the great and good and sensible cause of stamping out this pest and combating its ravages this bill carries only the sum of $215,155.

I now contend, Mr. Chairman, that I have established from the best sources of authority the following facts:

First. That the boll weevil is causing an enormous deficit in the Nation's great clothing supply.

Second. That this deficit is as likely to increase annually as to decrease.

Third. That within fifteen years the entire cotton belt of the Nation will be within boll-weevil territory.

Fourth. That vigorous and effective work on the part of the Department of Agriculture should be maintained and extended to every part of the boll-weevil territory.

Fifth. That the consumer of cotton throughout the land, and the producer who dwells within the boll-weevil territory, equally share in the loss ultimately resulting from the ravages of this insect, destined in a short while to cover the entire cotton belt.

Sixth. That it is the duty of the Nation—through its Agricultural Department, sustained by liberal appropriations for that specific purpose—to work toward eradicting this insect through the Bureau of Entomology on the one hand, while on the other the Bureau of Plant Industry should be permitted to keep up the good work it is now doing by demonstrating actually in every locality where necessary the methods by which a crop of cotton can still be made, notwithstanding the presence of the weevil.

But what are we doing in the matter of an appropriation to be used in this great, good, and sensible cause? The answer is found on page 18 of this bill, and is contained in the following words:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $215,155.

This is all. This is the Nation's annual contribution toward the work of solving a question so serious as to cause the Secretary of Agriculture himself to state that we suffered in the year immediately preceding that in which his last report was issued a loss of nearly $30,000,000 in our cotton crop. And when he shall have given out his estimates as to the percentage of loss in the crop of 1909 as a result of these ravages, I feel sure that the estimate will be greater than his last.

Mr. Chairman, had I consulted my own inclination, and my own conception of a reasonable amount to be appropriated for this purpose, knowing the situation in the cotton belt as I do, it would have been far greater than the amount contained in the bill which I introduced at the beginning of this session. A half million dollars would not be a cent too much. But realizing, as I did, how little the situation in the boll-weevil section of the cotton belt was understood in this House; how difficult it was to the Members of this body who dwell in all parts of this Nation, to conceive how a small insect of this kind should require such strenuous efforts on the part of the Agricultural Department to check its ravages, I fix the amount of $300,000 as the lowest possible amount which ought to be considered in this matter, and in my remarks to-day I have done my uttermost to lay before you the true facts in this matter; and that amount instead of $215,155 should be accepted by the Members of this body and duly incorporated as a part of this bill. A million would not be too much if you would but pause to think of the enormous interests the Nation has at stake.

But certainly, when you have the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture that the value of the cotton crop in 1909 is second only to one other of all the various agricultural crops of this Nation; when he estimates the total value of farm products of 1909 to be approximately $8,760,000,000, and of which this cotton crop comprises $850,000,000, almost one-thirteenth of the total, I submit that a little over a quarter of a million dollars is a most reasonable appropriation, considering the vast extent of the territory that must be covered in the demonstration work and the importance of the matter involved. Yet out of $13,417,136, which this measure now under consideration carries, there is not so much as one-fiftieth of that total devoted to the study of this great and grave crisis in the life of the second greatest agricultural product in value in the Nation. This great staple is now more seriously threatened than any other product ever has been. It has failed to keep pace with demand until a cotton famine may yet result, even if one is not now upon us. Such a crisis in the history of this great staple that even the conservative Secretary of Agriculture says of it:

> The subject is an extremely complicated one and will require additional work for several years.

I appeal to the Members of this body from the East on behalf of this appropriation, on the ground that it is to their interest that the great white staple which supplies their looms be not reduced in yield below what the market requires for consumption.

I appeal to the Members from the North and West, on the ground that it is to their interest that the great article of clothing, which protects them and their families from cold in winter and furnishes them the more shadowy and comfortable draperies for summer wear, be not destroyed, or partially so, by withholding a just appropriation at this time.

I appeal to those of the South not yet within the confines of the boll-weevil circle, and who, now reveling in the prosperity of 15-cent cotton, may not stop to think of the shadow hanging over them; that of the silent army of strange insects which silently yet so steadily, slowly yet so surely, is marching ever, ever onward and outward, always leaving a rear guard to forage on the fields already conquered, while the advance of the outpost leads the destructive army ever onward until the Atlantic seaboard is reached and the conquest of cotton by a foreign enemy is complete.

As to the Members of this body who live in the boll-weevil territory, no appeal need be made; they know the seriousness of the situation; they fully realize that the future of the fleecy staple is in the balance and that the most serious problem that has ever confronted the cotton grower remains unsolved.

I appeal to this body as a whole not with the idea of requesting something for any particular locality, not for the benefit for one section of the country alone, but upon the ground that the appropriation sought is for a purpose entirely national in character when ultimate results are considered and the general principle underlying the reasons for appropriations in such matters of agriculture is fairly applied.

I appeal to you as a whole, not only upon the principle of Bentham "of the greatest happiness to the greatest number," but upon even a broader basis, namely, of the greatest good to every inhabitant of the entire Nation; and in the name of every consumer—whether "ultimate" or intermediate—as well as every producer of cotton I appeal to you to increase the appropriation for this good and patriotic purpose: The repelling of the invasion of our latest foreign enemy—the Mexican cotton boll weevil. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. DALZELL, Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FLOOD DISASTER IN FRANCE.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 334.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound regret of the great disaster caused by the recent floods in France, and is deeply stirred with sympathy for the unfortunate sufferers: And further,

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be delivered to the President of the United States, with the request that he communicate the same to the people of France.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that, in view of the rule announced by the Speaker with respect to requests for unanimous consent, the present occupant of the chair hesitates to recognize the gentleman for that purpose in respect to this resolution. This resolution would go on the calendar, and the Chair does not think it comes within the rule adopted by the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WANGER, for three days, on account of public business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. SCOTT (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War recommending legislation to readjust certain fiscal relations of the Panama Railroad (H. Doc. No. 600)—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, submitting amendment to estimate of appropriation for the Bureau of Standards (H. Doc. No. 599)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 28, 1910.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RAILROAD LANDS IN OREGON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, stating that in order to comply with the provisions of the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 24th instant relative to railroad lands in Oregon, it will be necessary to secure certain detailed information from that State, and that as soon as such information is received it will be prepared and transmitted to the Senate (S. Doc. No. 334), which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

LIST OF JUDGMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims amounting to $10,393.32, which have been presented to the Treasury Department and require an appropriation for their payment (S. Doc. No. 337), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

LIST OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of claims amounting to $90,965.90 allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 51 of the act of June 30, 1874 (S. Doc. No. 333), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact filed by the court in the following causes:

T. J. Coagar v. United States (S. Doc. No. 335); and William Erskine, administrator of the estate of John M. Doddridge, deceased, v. United States (S. Doc. No. 336).

The foregoing causes were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Illinois, relative to the establishment of a department of mines and mining in the Interior Department, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented a petition of the board of aldermen of New York City, N. Y., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction and completion of a battle ship at the navy-yard in that State, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Roosevelt Camp, No. 9, Department of California, Spanish War Veterans, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of volunteer officers and soldiers who served in the Philippine Islands beyond the period of their enlistment, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Bedford County, Va., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the rate of postage on periodicals, and also against the restriction of rural free delivery, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

H also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Lynden, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Society of Master House Painters and Decorators of Boston, Mass., praying for the passage of the so-called "Heyburn paint bill," which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of the Georgetown Citizens Association, of Washington, D. C., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of Rock Creek valley in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Wheeling, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a department of health, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition of Red Jacket Lodge, No. 367, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Calumet, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called "Borah-Dawson full-crew bill," which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to admit to the mails as second-class mail matter periodical publications issued by or under the auspices of benevolent and fraternal societies, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens and dairy farmers of Clinton and Ionia counties, Mich., remonstrating against the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry ex-Union soldiers of the civil war, of Ithaca, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called "Sherwood per diem pension bill," which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of McDonald, Covert, South Haven, Hartford, Lawrence, Bangor, Kibbie, Alamo, Charlotte, Stanton, Battle Creek, Iron River, Sterling, Robinson, Grandville, Allendale, Eastmanville, Bloomingdale, Breedsville, Bedford, Coral, and Lakeview, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of McPherson Post, No. 18, of Traverse City; of C. Colegrove Post, No. 232, of Marshall; of Frank Mason Post, No. 242, of Athens; of Weatherwax Post, No. 75, of Grand Haven; and of Woodbury Post, No. 45, of Adrian, all of the Department of Michigan, Grand Army of the Republic, in the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of the so-called "National Tribune pension bill," which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of the Kent County Chapter, Rhode Island Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the retention and strengthening of the Division of Information in the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, Department of Commerce and Labor, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BURKETT presented a memorial of the Nebraska Dairymen's Association, of Lincoln, Nebr., remonstrating against the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Roosevelt Camp, No. 9, Department of California, Spanish War Veterans, of California, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of volunteer officers and soldiers who served in the Philippine Islands beyond the period of their enlistment, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN presented a petition of the Surry County Peanut Growers' Association, of Elberon, Va., praying for the passage of the so-called "rural parcels-post bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Newport News, Va., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Lawrenceville, Va., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "postal savings-bank bill," which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of Illinois and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, James A. Rose, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true copy of house joint resolution No. 3 of the special session of the forty-sixth general assembly, adopted January 12, 1910, and filed January 26, 1910, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof, I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of state. Done at the city of Springfield this 26th day of January, A. D. 1910.

[SEAL.] JAMES A. ROSE.
Secretary of State.

House joint resolution 3.

Whereas the Congress of the United States now has under consideration a proposition to establish the national bureau of mines for such investigation as will aid the various States in providing for the proper protection of lives of the miners and the mineral resources of the country. Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring herein), That we earnestly urge upon the Congress of the United States the importance of the establishment of this national bureau of mines, and we earnestly urge our Representatives in both Houses of Congress to support the bill providing for the establishment of this bureau; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to each Member of Congress from Illinois and that an engrossed copy, under the great seal of state, certified to by the secretary of state, be transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President of the Senate of the National Congress.

Adopted by the house January 12, 1910.

EDWARD D. SHURTLEFF,
Speaker House of Representatives.

B. H. MCCANN,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Concurred in by the senate January 12, 1910.

JOHN G. OGLESBY,
President of the Senate.

J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 20th instant, proposing to appropriate $1,000 for printing the annual report of the superintendent of insurance for the years 1907–8, intended to be proposed to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1324) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to examine and adjust the accounts of William R. Little, or his heirs, with the Sac and Fox Indians, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 123) thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 11307) to legalize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Hill City, Aitkin County, Minn.; and

A bill (H. R. 17743) to authorize Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across Current River.

Mr. CRANE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3808) for the relief of E. C. Mansfield, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 124) thereon.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. CARTER. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for the repayment thereof, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 125) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether he will not make an effort at an early date to have this bill made the unfinished business of the Senate and pushed to final consideration?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will state that the report accompanying the bill is quite voluminous and probably will not be printed before Monday. When the report is printed and placed before the Senate, so as to enable Senators to examine it, I shall call up the bill and ask that it be made the unfinished business of the Senate, and that its consideration shall be proceeded with until a final vote is reached.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the extreme solicitude of the Senators from Pennsylvania and Montana regarding this bill is rather touching to me. I apprehend that this bill will take about the usual course, and that some of us will have an opportunity, at least, of looking at it before it is passed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the Senator from New Hampshire and those who entertain the views which he seems to entertain in opposition to the bill will, in the course of the debate, favor the Senate with an explanation of the basis of their opposition.

I have on two former occasions set forth at some length, and with such clearness as I could command, the merits of this measure as understood by the committee. Thus far a mute opposition has been displayed, but in no instance has any Senator sought to meet any argument made nor has anyone attempted to suggest any reason why this measure should not be enacted into law.

We ask for the bill candid consideration upon the part of those who are opposed to it, and we give the Senators who are in opposition the assurance that the bill will be pressed for consideration without any abatement of energy from the time the report is printed until the Senate shall have finally voted on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, with due humility I accept the Senator's rebuke. I shall, so far as I am concerned, treat this matter in my own way.

The Senator from Montana has no warrant in saying that I am opposed to this bill. I have never so expressed myself. I suggested, when the Senator was occupying much of the time of the last session in earnestly arguing a bill that there was no probability of passing, that there might be some features of it that I would like to address myself to. When the proper time arrives I shall exercise any parliamentary privilege that belongs to me, either to mutely consider the bill or consider it by making some observations to the Senate.

But I will repeat, Mr. President, that I apprehend this bill will take its usual course, that it will have fair consideration, and if a majority of the Senate wants to pass it, as is probable, then it will become a law.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, with due respect for the assumed humility of the Senator from New Hampshire, I take decided exception to the view that the bill would not have passed during the last Congress if a vote had been taken. Upon all occasions when a similar bill has been before the Senate I have urged discussion and action. I have importuned Senators who have been opposed to the bill to state the grounds of their opposition; and I have repeatedly requested unanimous consent to fix a day when a vote might be taken.

In the presence of the record I take it for granted that if the Senator makes an investigation, as in justice he should, he will take occasion to change his statement.

I see no reason, Mr. President, for any manifestation of feeling on this subject, and yet I can not refrain from exhibiting a certain amount of feeling in the presence of an apparent disposition to avoid a direct vote on this important measure.

Mr. President, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has twice reported this bill, and has reported it unanimously and favorably. During the last Congress it was the unfinished business, was called up repeatedly for consideration, and efforts were repeatedly made to secure consent to a day for the taking of a vote. Why Senators did not assent to the fixing of a time for a vote I am unable to say.

Mr. BAILEY. I will tell the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I objected to it because I did not think the bill ought to pass, and I will object to it every time that the request is preferred. So we will have no misunderstanding as to why objection was made to taking the vote.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Texas for that frankness which he always exhibits in reference to public measures and public debate in this Chamber.

The bill for the establishment of postal savings banks does not come in here as an innovation in the administration of government. This class of measure has received world-wide approval. Every civilized nation on the globe, save only Germany and the United States, with other inconsiderable exceptions, have tried this kind of legislation for half a century, or a less period in some cases. In 1861 the Government of Great Britain established a system of postal savings banks after a discussion which had continued from 1807 to that year, and the system in operation has justified all the predictions made in its behalf.

I propose when the measure comes forward again, which it will on next Monday, if the report is printed and ready for distribution, to offer anew the views I entertain with reference to the merits of this measure, and I shall put the Senator from New Hampshire to the test as to whether he is prepared to discuss the measure or give it fair consideration.

When a Senator suggests that this bill will take the usual course, I beg leave here and now to advise him emphatically that the usual course will be toward a vote on the measure. It can not be defeated by silence; it can not be ignored. It must be considered; it will be considered; and naught save a petty filibuster will defeat a vote on the measure at the present session of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is unnecessarily excited.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not ask the time of the Senator from New Hampshire except——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will then occupy the time.

I can not for my life imagine how a bill can be defeated by men remaining mute. I shall remain mute when I feel it my privilege to do so. I shall speak when I feel it my privilege to do so.

The Senator had better content himself. He is not going to alarm me in the least degree by any suggestion such as he has made. I have nothing to apologize for or to explain. I shall examine this bill. I shall support it if I think it is a proper bill to be supported. I shall oppose it in my own way if I think it ought to be opposed. That is all there is to it.

I presume the bill will pass. No doubt the Senator, with his energy and his large knowledge of parliamentary procedure, will push this bill along with great rapidity. Yet there are other measures which are likely to take a little of the time of the Senate for their consideration before we adjourn some time next summer.

I simply want to say to the Senator that he is not going to put me into any position that I do not choose to occupy, and that, so far as this measure is concerned, and all other measures, I shall exercise my own judgment and my own rights under the rules of the Senate in giving them such consideration as I think is proper.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it would be too bad to disturb the very amiable disposition which our friends upon the other side exhibit this morning. I suppose we are to have a new classification of Republicans. We have insurgents and we have anarchists among the Republicans. I suppose now you are going to have postal savings-bank Republicans and antipostal savings-bank Republicans.

It is not my mission to lead them, but I would gently remind them of what happened to us when we had so many different kinds of Democrats. There was a time when we were apparently more firmly entrenched in power than you are now, and then we had gold-standard Democrats and we had free-silver Democrats. The gold men called us anarchists, and we did not apply very soft epithets to them. But, of course, the world knows what happened, and what has happened once may happen again.

With these amiable and pet phrases which Republicans are applying to each other, now of insurgents on the one hand and anarchists on the other, I think the patriotic Democrats of this country will come duly into their own.

As far as I am concerned, I am willing for each faction of the Republican party to say anything it pleases about the other.

I am inclined to think that all they will say will fall a little short of the truth. So these exhibitions do not disturb me in the least; they are rather gratifying.

But I want to say this to the Senator from Montana: One reason why nobody has seen fit to make any argument against the postal savings-bank bill up to this time is that nobody has made any sufficient argument in favor of it. I am not unmindful of the fact that the Senator from Montana delivered an elaborate speech. I examined it with some care. I do not mean to flatter; I mean to speak the truth when I say, and I say it in sober earnestness, that a cause which can not command a better defense for it than the Senator from Montana has made for his bill must be a bad one indeed. The Senator from Montana finally, as his warrant for passing this bill under the Constitution of the United States, relied upon the general-welfare clause.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, whatever may have been said to warrant the Senator in reaching that conclusion, I beg to advise him that the Senator from Montana does not rely upon the general-welfare clause of the Constitution as a warrant for this legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from Montana say that in the course of the discussion he did not derive the power to pass this bill from that clause of the Constitution?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the general-welfare clause of the Constitution was mentioned and generally discussed upon this subject. I do not recall having personally referred to it except in some indirect way. I will say to the Senator that that clause is not relied upon as a warrant for this legislation from my point of view.

Mr. BAILEY. We are making some progress. While I of course understand that it would be bad taste to catechise a Senator upon any matter, especially upon a matter like this, and I will not do that, I will content myself to reread the very interesting address of the Senator from Montana, in order that I may discover the clause of the Constitution from which he does derive the power to enact a law like this. I will not insist that the Senator from Montana distinctly predicated this power upon the general-welfare clause, and, at the risk of being mistaken again, I will say that it was the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT].

Mr. BURKETT rose.

Mr. BAILEY. And that brings him to his feet.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not know——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not recall the position of the Senator from Montana actually, but I do remember very distinctly my reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], or perhaps the Senator from Texas, with reference to it, and nowhere in my remarks will the Senator find that I based the bill on the general-welfare clause alone. The question was asked, and I replied that there was probably a sufficient basis in the general-welfare clause, but that there was plenty of other ground for a postal savings bank and plenty of other authority outside of that.

Mr. RAYNER. May I interrupt the Senator from Texas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. RAYNER. I wish to read, for the benefit of the Senator from Nebraska, the short colloquy that took place between us on that subject. I asked the Senator from Nebraska the question. I said:

> Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am in favor of this bill or opposed to it. The trouble I have about it is this: You will admit that we must put this bill under some clause of the Constitution. Now, what clause of the Constitution is it under which this legislation is proposed?
> Mr. BURKETT. I will say, in response to the Senator's inquiry, that I expect to refer briefly to that a little later on, but I think the general-welfare clause would cover it.
> Mr. RAYNER. The general-welfare clause would cover everything on earth. I am aware of that.
> Mr. BURKETT. Well, it has covered a good many things, I will say to the Senator.
> Mr. RAYNER. Is that the proposition? You do not put it under the clause to establish post-offices and post-roads, for it is hardly possible that it could turn a post-office into a bank; you do not put it under the clause giving the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof; but this bill is put under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Some of us want to understand that, because we do not believe—I certainly do not believe—that the general-welfare clause means anything in the world, and I do not think the Supreme Court of the United States has ever said that it does.

A little later on the Senator from Nebraska said:

> I am not disturbed by any fear of lack of power that we may have to enact this legislation. As I replied to the Senator from Maryland, the general-welfare clause has been too liberally interpreted and too often relied upon to sustain necessary legislation for the good of the people to halt at this particular time and in this particular legislation.

I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I propose to refer to this matter a little later on. I am not prepared to say how I shall vote on this bill so far as the policy is concerned, but I am looking for some constitutional provision under which Senators place the bill. There was no discussion at the last Congress as to any constitutional provision upon which the bill was placed. I recollect the splendid address of the Senator from Montana, and he did not give us any grant of power. This is the grant of power that the Senator from Nebraska placed it upon.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Maryland will look a long time and look in vain for any authority in the Constitution of the United States to pass a law of this kind. But, Mr. President, at the proper time I will express myself on that point. I thought it was right that the responsibility for the delay should be placed where it belongs. I am partly responsible for the failure to vote on the bill in the last Congress; and I should be delighted to bear the responsibility of preventing a vote on it during this Congress.

I believe if we can keep it before the American people long enough, we can convince them of the absurdity of contending that they have sense enough to take care of this Government and not sense enough to take care of the money which they earn. At the proper time I will elaborate that view.

But I intend to indulge in no filibuster. Bad as this measure is, if the American Congress chooses to pass it, the American Congress must take its responsibility. However, I want to record this prophecy: If they once enact it, they will never repeal it. Once the Government does something for the people which they ought to do for themselves, there will be no recession. If the American Government would deliver coal and milk to the people of the United States for the next two years, you could not find one man in ten who would go back to the old system of individual delivery.

So I have no hope, if this policy is once engrafted upon our statute books, that it will ever be abandoned. Neither have I any doubt that it will become a precedent for still further invasion by the Government of the domain of individual or corporate enterprise.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, constitutional discussions are always delightful, but I think it would be just as well to dispose of the morning business in regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is reports of committees.

Mr. BAILEY. This was a report of a committee, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report was made. Are there no further reports of committees?

ADJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. PENROSE. From the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I report back adversely a number of resolutions relative to the adjustment of postmasters' salaries, and move their indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

S. Res. 32. By Mr. DICK, April 15, 1909.
S. Res. 69. By Mr. BRADLEY, July 23, 1909.
S. Res. 72. By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, August 5, 1909.
S. Res. 77. By Mr. GALLINGER, August 5, 1909.
S. Res. 96. By Mr. TAYLOR, December 10, 1909.
S. Res. 102. By Mr. CLAPP, December 16, 1909.
S. Res. 103. By Mr. MONEY, December 20, 1909.
S. Res. 104. By Mr. FRYE, December 20, 1909.
S. Res. 108. By Mr. MCCUMBER, December 20, 1909.
S. Res. 116. By Mr. DEPEW, January 5, 1910.
S. Res. 117. By Mr. SMOOT, January 5, 1910.
S. Res. 118. By Mr. PERKINS, January 5, 1910.
S. Res. 122. By Mr. JONES, January 5, 1910.
S. Res. 123. By Mr. CULLOM, January 5, 1910.
S. Res. 128. By Mr. WARREN, January 10, 1910.
S. Res. 130. By Mr. ELKINS, January 11, 1910.
S. Res. 133. By Mr. RICHARDSON, January 12, 1910.
S. Res. 136. By Mr. FRAZIER, January 13, 1910.
S. Res. 137. By Mr. HUGHES, January 13, 1910.
S. Res. 139. By Mr. BULKELEY, January 17, 1910.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] that the resolutions be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CULLOM. Before the motion is put, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he is making a final report on the general question as to whether there is anything due to those claimants?

Mr. PENROSE. The understanding I had with the Senate was that these resolutions would be acted on prior to February 1; hence I have reported them to-day. I shall file a formal report, stating the result of the hearings, as soon as it can be completed, which I suppose will be on Monday.

This is a final disposition of these claims, so far as the existing law is concerned. There is a bill, introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK], pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, amending the present law in connection with the claims. That bill will be duly considered, and it will be reported later on.

Mr. MONEY. May I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads whether there is a written report accompanying the return of these resolutions?

Mr. PENROSE. The formal report of the committee I expect to have ready by Monday, but having promised the Senate a report on the resolutions before the 1st of February, I felt it my duty to report them back to-day. I will state for the information of the Senator from Mississippi that the resolutions have practically been abandoned by their authors and by the attorneys interested in them.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, that is important information to some people. I am not interested in the attorneys nor in the officials. I am interested in the people who make the claims. If there is no claim that is decided by the department to be open to readjustment according to the present law, if the law does not justify it, there is no necessity for doing anything. If the claims have been once adjusted there is no necessity of readjusting them. It is not a question of clerks and time, but it is a question of simple justice. I am pleased with the assurance of the Senator that there will be a written report upon the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. There will be a full, concise report which I hope will be final for all time on these claims, which I will make on Monday; but it was generally conceded after the hearings, by the friends of these resolutions and by the opponents, that this is not the right way to go about collecting these claims; that an act of Congress is necessary; and a bill for that purpose has been introduced and is being considered.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will indulge me a little further, I am not at all concerned about the method of proceeding, but I am about the result. What the Senate should decide to do, and what the Government of the United States should desire to do, is to pay an honest debt if there be any such due and unpaid.

It makes no difference with me whether these resolutions are passed or whether a bill is deemed necessary and shall be provided by the committee and passed upon by the Senate to give these people at least an opportunity to prove that they have a claim. That is all that anybody can justly want.

As far as attorneys are concerned, I have heard that the man whose name was used here most frequently is dead. I think he died recently; at least, he is dead. I do not know whether there is any other attorney in the case or not, but here is the fact about it: The report ought to disclose the reasons which the Senator has just offered to the Senate why the resolutions should be postponed and a bill substituted. I do not doubt but what the report will do it, and that is what I am looking for with some interest.

Mr. PENROSE. I will state for the information of the Senator that the committee was unanimous in this report and all parties were unanimous in it. The bill to give these claims an opportunity for consideration will be before the Senate at the proper time for consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the resolutions now reported adversely by the Senator from Pennsylvania are merely resolutions of inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. LODGE. The report of the committee is that these resolutions of inquiry should not be adopted by the Senate. It does not go to the merits of the claim.

Mr. PENROSE. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. Those are to be dealt with later on.

Mr. PENROSE. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. It is merely a report that in the opinion of the committee these resolutions of inquiry are not in conformity with law and should not be sent to the department.

Mr. PENROSE. That is it.

Mr. MONEY. I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, if he intends to take any action upon these resolutions until that report is filed? I suggest to him that it would be very much better to wait until the report is filed before any action is taken at the present time on the resolutions.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill will be promptly considered by the committee, referred to the department, and the advocates and opponents will be given a fair hearing.

Mr. MONEY. Has the bill been introduced and printed, and is it simply in the hands of the committee?

Mr. PENROSE. It was introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK]. It has been printed and is pending now before the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I only brought this subject up for the purpose of inquiring just what the final action would be. The Senator from Pennsylvania has stated that very fully, and I think he is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the resolutions be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 5878) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Owen (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURTON:

A bill (S. 5879) granting a pension to Edward Billow; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5880) granting an increase of pension to Bailey D. Judkins (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 5881) granting an increase of pension to Kate M. Miner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURKETT:

A bill (S. 5882) granting an increase of pension to Harry A. Shuman (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN:

A bill (S. 5883) for the relief of the heirs of John Wescott;

A bill (S. 5884) for the relief of the estate of Ella P. Williams; and

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for rent of buildings and moving expenses incident thereto at Charleston, W. Va., intended to be proposed to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 to purchase additional land necessary for the army post at Fort Taylor, Key West, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

LORINDA A. HOOKS.

Mr. BULKELEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 160), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 160.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Lorinda A. Hooks, widow of Charles E. Hooks, late a messenger, United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary, at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

BANKING IN CANADA.

Mr. BURROWS. From the National Monetary Commission I present a paper, being the history of banking in Canada, prepared by Roeliff Morton Breckinridge. I move that the paper be printed as a public document.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by M. C. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On January 27, 1910:

S. 506. An act authorizing a credit in certain accounts of the Treasurer of the United States.

On January 28, 1910:

S. 4089. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River and to establish it as a post-road.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. GORE on the 27th instant, as follows:

Senate resolution 157.

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative cost in the United States of transporting publications designated as "second-class mail matter" by mail, express, and fast freight.

Second. That the said committee be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid by the United States Government and by the express companies to the principal railroad companies in the United States for similar services in transporting publications designated as "second-class mail matter."

Third. That the committee be further directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative postal rates for transporting periodicals designated as "second-class mail matter" in the United States, in the Dominion of Canada, and other foreign countries.

Fourth. That the committee be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid to the leading railroad companies for transporting the several classes of mail by the Governments of the United States, Canada, Great Britain, France, and Germany in their respective jurisdictions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to withhold that motion until I can perfect the resolution by adding another clause to it.

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly; I will withhold the motion with pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma modifies his resolution in the manner which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Add to the resolution the following clause:

Fifth. That the committee ascertain and report to the Senate whether there have been any violations of section 3982 of the Revised Statutes of 1878, being section 181 of the Criminal Code of the United States, and also section 203 of the Revised Criminal Code of the United States; and if so, to recommend needful legislation to prevent and punish further violations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be now read as modified. I shall then ask a yea-and-nay vote on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I do not care to discuss the question now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution, as modified by the Senator from Oklahoma, will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it seems to me that the information called for by the resolution ought to be exceedingly desirable not only to every member of the Senate, but to the country at large. It would perhaps be the basis of legislation at the present session of Congress. It goes directly to the allegation that the deficit in the Post-Office Department is due to the low rate now prevailing on second-class mail matter. A different view is entertained on this subject by different Senators. From my own point of view, I regard this deficit, even if it were due to these low postal rates, as a kind of taxation for public education and for the dissemination of knowledge and news among the people of the country. I can see no reason why the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads should be required to investigate this resolution and determine whether that committee should be called upon to ascertain and furnish the information. That is certainly a question for the Senate to determine.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GORE. With pleasure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish simply to make a suggestion to the Senator from Oklahoma, if he pleases. The resolution, with which I am in sympathy, calls for the information from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. My suggestion is that a more direct inquiry would bring the speedier result, and that is to make the inquiry of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there is surely some force in the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota, and I had considered that seriously; but it seemed to me that an investigation by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, where there would be an opportunity for inquiry on the part of a number of Senators of different political views, might assure a more thorough investigation and more accurate information. For the genius of the Postmaster-General as a past master in practical politics my view yields to no member of the Senate and no citizen of this country; but whether the investigation and report made by him would differ materially from his special report already submitted to Congress, and whether it would differ materially from the views and recommendations of his chief, I question very seriously. For that reason I did not think it advisable to call upon the Postmaster-General for the information sought by this resolution.

I hope the resolution will be adopted, that the investigation will be made in good faith, that witnesses will be summoned before the committee, and that questions may be propounded by each and every member of the committee without any reference to the political effects which may follow upon the investigation and the report. I wish a thorough, a fair, an impartial, and a nonpartisan investigation and a report founded upon such investigation. I trust delay will be obviated.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am not in any way opposed to the inquiry contemplated by the Senator from Oklahoma. It would only seem reasonable, however, to refer this resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in order that it may be carefully looked into and, if possible, rendered more effective in places. Much of this information I have no doubt could be obtained by a request from the Post-Office Department. The inquiry proposed is very sweeping; there is no appropriation accompanying the resolution, and no power of subpœna for witnesses. While the information would be interesting and useful, and I should be most happy to aid the Senator in obtaining it, I do not see that any harm will follow by having the resolution referred to the committee to be examined into and perfected, and an early report made thereon on the lines contemplated by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is gratifying to be assured that the Senator from Pennsylvania is not opposed to this investigation; and I feel certain, upon that assurance, that the investigation will be made. On the other hand, if the Senator should have opposed it, I should gravely have doubted the probability of a favorable report and an investigation. I may say that I had intended, if this resolution should slumber overtime in that committee, to offer a resolution similar to the one suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. I intended to do that, however, not as the first and the best method of obtaining the information, but rather as a last resort.

I may further submit as an additional reason for my apparent insistence that my experience in regard to referring such resolutions to committees has not been entirely satisfactory. The great rush of business and the preoccupation of various committees have oftimes prevented necessary investigations and the obtaining of needful information for enlightened legislation. I have sometimes seen the legend of despair written above the portals of these committee rooms which suggests to the authors of such resolutions, "Leave hope behind all ye who enter here." If in this case this committee should prove to be a cemetery, I shall move the resurrection of the resolution after three days.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad, Mr. President, that the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is to go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and is to receive the early consideration of that committee. I think, however, that it ought to be even broader than it is. I feel that the resolution ought to include the franking privilege, and that an investigation of the use of the franking privilege by public officials should be made. So far as my own observation goes, I have never understood the misuse of that privilege. I do not believe it is abused. I believe it is used with discretion, with care, and in the interest of the public. If that is not so, the facts ought to be revealed, and I hope when the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads takes this resolution under consideration that it will give careful attention to the question of the use or misuse of the franking privilege. If government officials misuse that privilege or impose unjust and heavy burdens upon the department, it should be taken from them. Again and again public men have been charged with the misuse of the privileges and it may be true, although I do not believe it. I believe the committee can, with perfect propriety, investigate that feature of the Post-Office Department, and I hope it will be done. Speaking for myself, the franking privilege has never been misused, and I dare say that every other Senator in this Chamber could truthfully state the same fact. If we are burdening the mails unjustly and unfairly, that abuse ought to be cut off in order that others shall not be burdened for our convenience. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will enlarge the scope of his resolution, and that when it is reported it may include an investigation into the use of the franking privilege.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with what the Senator from Michigan has stated. I think I can speak for the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and say that they have steadily set their faces, in view of repeated importunities, against extending the franking privilege. I do not remember an instance in which a request has been granted to extend that privilege. On the contrary, the committee has always been ready to restrict it to the narrowest proper limits and to protect the Government from the abuses—many of them trivial, some of them of great magnitude—which are constantly occurring in connection with the exercise of this privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to refer the resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not think the resolution is broad enough to cover the suggestion I have made. I should like to have it include that suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. The committee can amend the resolution; and after what the Senator has said, the committee will consider that phase as part of the resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, the resolution calls for information that I think we ought to have; and I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads whether it is practicable for that committee, within a reasonable length of time, to get the information and make a report? If not, I think it is a mistake for the committee to undertake it. If it involves so much work that we will not have the information here in time to make any use of it, some speedier way of securing it ought to be provided. I should like to hear from the chairman on that matter.

Mr. PENROSE. For the information of the Senator, I will say that is just what we want to find out. If the Senate will refer this resolution to the committee, I will promptly report what can be done within a reasonable time and what part of this information is already to be found in the Government's reports or accessible in the records of the department.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in view of the statement just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], of course I do not care to have a vote taken on the reference of the resolution. I will say, furthermore, to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] that in order to "make assurance doubly sure" I shall submit a similar resolution calling upon the Postmaster-General for this information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

WAGES AND PRICES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I inquire if the morning business is closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] in regard to the cost of living, I desire, if the Senate will permit me, to occupy a very brief time in bringing to their attention some tables which I have compiled in regard to wages and prices. These tables have, I think, an important bearing upon the subject of that resolution, which, I believe, is now under consideration by one of the committees, and which I trust will soon be reported.

There are many subjects, Mr. President, which have given rise to a great deal of discussion during the past fifty years in connection with the tariff on imports and the rates of duties imposed. The point upon which this discussion has chiefly turned, however, has always been involved in the comparison between wages paid here and those paid abroad in similar industries. That this should be the case is inevitable, because the controlling reason for a protective tariff lies in its efficiency in maintaining the higher rates of wages and better standards of living, which undoubtedly exist in this country as compared with the rates of wages and standards of living in other countries. The mere fact of the large and constant immigration to the United States of people who thus seek to better their condition is a convincing proof of the truth of the general proposition, but it is necessary to go further than this in order to demonstrate the necessity of duties which shall equal the difference between labor costs here and abroad. With this object in view the tables which follow have been compiled. They show from official sources the different rates of wages paid in similar industries here and abroad, and they tell their own story to all who will take the trouble to examine them. Anyone, however, whether manufacturer or wage-earner, whose prosperity and livelihood depend upon our industries should in considering these tables remember two things: First, that if foreign competition is to be met without the protection of a tariff duty, it can be met in only one of two ways, either by abandoning the industry or by bringing the wages of the United States down to the level of the competing foreign industry. There is no other point except wages where effective reduction can be made to meet foreign competition, for the higher cost of the American plant is itself due to the higher wages paid to the mechanics and laborers engaged in the construction of the mill or factory. Capital will not seek an unprofitable industry, and if foreign competition makes an industry unprofitable it must either cease or bring its wages down to the foreign level.

The second point to be remembered is this: That it is not alone those who earn wages in the protected industries who are affected by the tariff and foreign competition. Every wage-earner is equally affected, because if there is a general reduction of wages in the protected industries owing to foreign competition brought in through the abolition of the protective tariff, the whole wage scale of the United States will be lowered. This will follow, because the people thrown out of employment in the protected industries will pour into other occupations, including not only the trades but the labor of the farm, and will by their necessity of finding work reduce the wages in all employments, whether directly affected by the tariff or not. Every one, therefore, who earns wages, whether in a protected industry or in a mechanical trade or by any form of labor, should make a careful study of wages and prices here and abroad in order that he may vote intelligently in his own interest upon the question of maintaining or overthrowing the protective tariff.

The tables which follow have been compiled, with only two or three exceptions, from official sources. The figures have been taken chiefly from our own consular reports and from the reports of the British Board of Trade which cover the month of October, 1905, except in the textile industries where they cover the whole of the year 1906. Some statistics have been taken from the reports of the Department of Commerce and Labor and the Tariff Hearings, and, in one or two instances, where no other information could be obtained, from private sources. It has been possible to obtain fairly complete statistics of wages in England, France, and Germany. In certain of the larger industries I have been able to get statistics of wages from Italy, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and Belgium, but there are some countries in Europe where no statistics are obtainable, and there are no official figures as to wages in the Far East, except in the case of Japan. In the smaller industries it is difficult to obtain statistics from more than two or three countries.

Wage-earners everywhere should examine these tables, for they deserve careful consideration, and then compare them with the wages paid here and the wages they themselves are receiving in similar industries.

I ask permission, Mr. President, as I do not want to take up the time of the Senate by reading them, to print the statements and tables to which I refer. They are statistical computations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

The statements and tables referred to are as follows:

Agricultural implements.

GERMANY.

Report of Special Agent R. R. Dennis on wages paid in the manufacture of agricultural implements in Berlin, Germany (United States Consular Reports):

"The working hours are from 6.30 to 8.15 a. m., 8.30 to 12, 1 to 4 p. m., and 4.15 to 6 p. m., making ten hours per day; Saturday they work from 1 to 5.15 p. m., making a week's work fifty-nine and one-half hours.

"I learned that 'schlossers' (what we would call benchmen, working at a vise) are paid at the maximum 0.65 mark to 0.70 mark (15½ to 16¾ cents) per hour; lathe and drill hands, 0.55 mark ($0.131); smiths, 0.52 mark ($0.124); common laborers, 0.35 mark ($0.083). So far as possible the entire works are run on a piecework basis, the week's wages varying from 46 to 60 marks ($10.95 to $14.28). Saturday of each week is pay day, the entire works being paid up to and including the previous Tuesday.

"These works have an excellent plan of controlling the cost of all their products by keeping a very sharp control of the average cost per hour of their skilled labor, which average at present is 0.498 mark ($0.1185). The general average of all labor is 0.481 mark ($0.1145) per hour.

"Wages in England and Germany are from 25 to 50 per cent lower than in this country." (Tariff Hearings, p. 7314.)

Automobile parts and bodies.

ITALY.

Statement of Special Agent Carden, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, in regard to wages paid in automobile factories in France and Italy (United States Consular Reports):

ISOTTA-FRASCHINI WORKS AT MILAN, ITALY.

"The Isotta-Fraschini works are paying tool men between 45 and 50 centimes (100 centimes = 1 franc = 19.3 cents) per hour on a ten hour per day basis. An operator working at a Herbert turret lathe, when questioned in my presence as to his pay, exhibited a ring job on which he was engaged, and said he is able to finish about 15 of these rings per day. For each ring he received 45 centimes, which would mean 6.75 francs for a day's work. This rate of pay, from an American view point, is extremely low."

FIAT AUTOMOBILE WORKS AT TURIN, ITALY.

At a group of Jones & Lamson turret lathes three tool hands, each working his own machine, were questioned in my presence as to wages earned. One man replied 37 centimes (7 cents) per hour, the second 38 centimes (7⅜ cents) per hour, and the third 34 centimes (6½ cents) per hour. A working day at the shops comprises ten hours.

All gear boxes are of aluminum construction. Men doing hand-work in finishing off these gear boxes, when questioned, replied that they were receiving 35 centimes (6¾ cents) per hour. One man working at a Gleason gear cutter stated that he was receiving 35 centimes per hour.

A man at the Potter & Johnston group of tools was turning out differential pinion clutch work, having a diameter of 136.7 millimeters (approximately 5.39 inches), with a spindle diameter of 56 millimeters (2.2 inches). The work was of a highly finished character. This man stated he was receiving 38 centimes (7⅜ cents) per hour. He was able to turn out about five of these clutches per day, or about one every two hours.

FRANCE.

A. CLEMENT AUTOMOBILE WORKS, NEAR PARIS, FRANCE.

Lathe men are paid on an average 80 centimes (16 cents) per hour. The maximum received by lathe men is about 1.20 francs per hour. Payment is by piecework. The men at the milling machines receive on an average between 80 and 85 centimes per hour, and the maximum does not exceed 1.20 francs. The men at the grinders receive on an average 90 centimes per hour, and a maximum of 1.20 francs. The same statement applies to blacksmiths and coppersmiths. The men working at the drills, slotters, and planers average about 80 centimes per hour. The maximum for all three tools is 1.20 francs per hour.

DE DION-BOUNTON & CIE. AUTOMOBILE WORKS AT PARIS.

Lathe hands receive at the de Dion works wages ranging from 85 centimes to 1 franc (19 cents) per hour. This is on engine lathes. On the Alfred Herbert turret lathe the wages run from 85 centimes to 1.25 francs per hour.

One woman was caring for 4 millers and was receiving about 70 centimes per hour. Women operatives were also running gleason gear cutters. One of them had worked at these machines for four years steadily, with the exception of four months' absence as the result of injury. The women operatives are receiving 70 centimes per hour. Seven women were found at work running millers and gear cutters. It is the first time I have found women intrusted with these high-grade machines.

Extract from United States Consular Reports in regard to wages in Italy:

"Very probably the automobile industry in Italy will be among the first to be affected by changing conditions of living and of wage. The Government, with the intention of relieving the increasing tension between low wage scale and rapidly enhancing cost of living, has caused the department of labor to go deeply into the question of day pay in sundry industries. It found that the wages paid workmen in automobile factories, per hour, are as follows: Mounting motors, 8 to 10 cents; mounting carriages, 6 to 8 cents; modelers, 10 cents; adjusters, 6 to 7 cents; finishers, 7 to 8 cents; coppersmiths, 7 to 8 cents; blacksmiths, 8 to 9 cents; electricians, 7 cents; and helpers, 4 to 6 cents. Apprentices receive from 1 to 3 cents an hour."

Statement of Henry B. Joy, Packard Motor Car Company, and Benjamin Briscoe, Maxwell-Briscoe Motor Company (Tariff Hearings, p. 2700):

"Foreign cars can be made cheaper than American, due to the difference in the cost of labor and material, as we prove by the figures shown here.

"The rate of wages in the automobile industry in France, Italy, Belgium, and Austria is very low as compared to America, averaging as follows:

[Cents per hour.]

	France.	Austria and Italy.	Belgium.	America.
Blacksmiths	11	8.5	10	28.1

"Apprentices in France are compelled to serve without pay two and one-half to three years. Compare this with the rate of wages in the United States, where all except laborers and apprentices receive from 11 cents as the lowest rate to 41.6 cents as the highest rate per hour.

"The following schedule shows the rate of wages paid in the leading factories of this country:

Baskets, rattan and willow ware.

Statement of Business Men's Association of Liverpool, N. Y. (Tariff Hearings, p. 3226):

"How can American workmen compete with the foreign maker who earns from 25 to 38 cents a day and who won't or can't come over here and help support American institutions, but seeks only our markets? An ordinary workman with us, at the skilled trade of willow clothes basket making, earns in ten hours 90 cents to a dollar a day.

"Last year the willow stripper of this country received $10 to $12 a ton. This year $8 to $9. This work is done by men, women, and children, can be done indoors, and in the winter; but the man who does the heavy parts of the work does well to make 40 or 50 cents in ten hours. The others in proportion. How can an American citizen work for such wages and retain his self-respect, let alone pay rent and live?"

These wages have been forced down by foreign competition at from 25 to 38 cents per day.

Report of United States Consul W. L. Lowrie in United States Consular Reports in regard to the shoe industry in Erfurt, Germany:

"Consul Will L. Lowrie writes that three of the largest German shoe-manufacturing establishments in Erfurt are now in charge of experts from the United States. He also tells of their industrial operations:

"All these factories are producing American-shaped shoes, which are meeting with ready sale in Germany. Certainly one, and perhaps all, of these concerns will make a display at the forthcoming shoe exposition in Boston (in September, 1909), and will try to secure a foothold in the American market.

Brooms and brushes.

Statement of Frank N. Look, of the Florence Manufacturing Company, Florence, Mass. (Tariff Hearings, p. 6453):

"We have been manufacturing toilet brushes for forty-two years and employ about 500 people. For a number of years we have been endeavoring to manufacture popular-priced toothbrushes, now principally made in Asiatic and European countries.

"A few facts bearing upon the exact labor conditions are impressive. We employ no child labor. In Japan children are more or less employed, at less than 1 cent per hour. Women with us earn from 10 to 20 cents per hour; in Japan from 1½ to 2 cents per hour. Japanese wages are taken from the report of a commission appointed by the Japanese Government. We pay our male labor from 15 to 35 cents per hour. In Japan male labor is paid about 5 cents per hour. In a large brush manufactory employing over 700 hands in Austria skilled male labor receives from 9 to 11 cents per hour. Women are paid from 5 to 6 cents per hour. In this particular factory the highest paid man, a master mechanic, receives about 15 cents per hour, whereas with us we would pay 40 to 50 cents per hour.

"As labor is more than one-half the cost of toothbrushes, the present rate of duty of 40 per cent ad valorem still gives the Japanese and the Europeans decided advantage over American labor on the present basis of American wages. Japanese toothbrushes made by hand confront one everywhere throughout the United States at prices which absolutely preclude successful competition by American labor, even under the present duty of 40 per cent.

"The introduction of modern machinery in Japan, such as is in general use in Europe, especially in Germany and Austria, coupled with the very low-priced labor of Japan, would produce a startling effect upon the brush industry in America. In the application of machinery to the manufacture of toothbrushes Germany and Austria especially are in advance of the rest of the world, including America as well.

"In Austria and in Germany many operations are performed by women where we are obliged to employ men, thus creating a much wider difference in labor costs than is apparent in an actual comparison of wages paid. This must be equally true of conditions in Japan, where wages paid women are so much less than paid in Austria and Germany. In Belgium and in Germany women dress bristles and do classes of work which are not and can not be performed by women under American conditions.

"A low-priced, moderate-sized toothbrush manufactured by machinery in Austria represents an actual labor cost of 73 cents per gross in comparison with an actual labor cost in America of $2.08 per gross."

Statement of Fiberoid Company, of Indian Orchard, Mass. (Tariff Hearings, p. 153):

"We are in receipt of information, obtained through the Department of Commerce and Labor, that there are now two plants being constructed in Japan for the manufacture of 'compounds of pyroxylin,' with an estimated yearly output of about 1,350,000 pounds, and that such plants are expected to be in operation by April, 1909. As the total imports of such 'compounds of pyroxylin' into Japan for 1907 were only about 266,000 pounds, it would leave an excess of about 1,000,000 pounds for which they would have to seek foreign markets.

"One of these companies has already induced important employees, filling confidential positions with your petitioners, to accept employment with them, and has had their machinery constructed by manufacturers in this country, who have gained their knowledge through the invention and expenditures of the undersigned; the other company has pursued similar tactics in Europe.

"In the report of the department of finance of the Japanese Government, published at Tokyo, 1908, is given a comparative table of 'daily average wages of laborers' (p. 77), including some 52 different occupations, by which it appears that the highest daily wage paid is 41 cents (bricklayers), while the lowest is 10½ cents (female weavers); the average, including every variety of skilled labor, is about 14½ cents per day, about one-eighth to one-tenth the amount paid by us for ordinary employees; the difference between such necessary skilled help as superintendents, foremen, chemists, salesmen, clerical help, etc., is, of course, much greater.

"Camphor is perhaps the most important ingredient entering into 'compounds of pyroxylin,' as it is much the most expensive. The Japanese Government practically controls the world's supply of camphor through its 'monopoly bureau,' the entire output being sold through the firm of Mitsui & Co. These gentlemen are the owners of the largest of the two Japanese factories referred to above. It is a foregone conclusion that in order to foster a home industry the Japanese manufacturer will be allowed to purchase his supplies of camphor at a price which alone will make a difference of 8 or 10 cents a pound on the finished product."

Extracts from United States Consular Reports, November 4 and 16, 1908:

"The following information concerning a new company organized for the purpose of establishing a celluloid factory in Japan is furnished by Consul John H. Snodgrass, of Kobe:

"The factory, with a capital of $500,000, will be erected upon the banks of the Yamato River, near Sakai, and will be the largest concern of the kind in Japan. The machinery and plant, which have been ordered from Europe, are expected to arrive by the end of this year. The superintendent engineer of the company has been engaged in the United States, and the plans of the factory are now being prepared. Upon completion of the plans the construction of the factory will be commenced without delay, and the company expects to begin the manufacture of celluloid in April next. In this connection it may be stated there is considerable interest exhibited in the possibilities of celluloid products in Japan. It is reported that another company has been formed for the manufacture of celluloid at Abashi, in the Province of Harima, capitalized at $600,000.

"JAPANESE NOTES.

"The construction of the celluloid factories at Aboshi, near Himeji, is progressing. A Swiss engineer has been engaged as superintendent. The machinery is understood to be of German pattern, though ordered from a French firm which has supplied similar machinery and plant to a German celluloid company on the Rhine. The construction of the Mitsui celluloid factory on the Yamato River at Sakai, near Osaka, is also being pushed on. The machinery and plant have been ordered, and as superintendent and engineer the chief engineer of a New Jersey celluloid company in America has been engaged."

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in the ready-made clothing industry (United States Consular Reports):

"The 1901 census showed that among persons employed in "non-textile factories" in Leeds there were 20,220 classed as being in the clothing business, the great bulk of these being women and girls. In this industry the men cutters get $6.80 to $8.25 a week, the women machine sewers $2.67 to $3.89, and the women finishers $1.94 to $3.40 a week. The wages of operatives in the woolen and worsted factories have been treated elsewhere, but the wages of full-timers run from 8 to 30 shillings ($1.94 to $7.29) a week; a few up to 35 shillings ($8.50). Over $8.50 a week is very rare even for the most skilled workers.

Combs.

Statement of John Walton, Philadelphia (Tariff Hearings, p. 7163):

"The wage scale in the Aberdeen Comb Works, Scotland, of which we have positive information, as per attached sworn affidavit, is as follows: Managers receive salaries not exceeding $15 per week; foremen from $6 to $7.50 per work; the best workmen from $4 to $6.50 per week. Women earn an average of from $2 to $3, and boys, who must be 14 years old, start at $1 per week, and they receive this rate for a considerable period.

"As comb making is not considered a man's work in Scotland, outside of manager, foremen, machinists, and a few men for very hard work, the large proportion of employees are women and minors.

"On the contrary, our labor is principally men.

"A conservative estimate of the relative amount of the labor cost as between the foreign and domestic manufacturers is that the foreign wages for the same amount of labor would be less than 33⅓ per cent of the American wage cost. These figures relate particularly to Scotland, and are well within the facts. In other countries the rates would probably be lower."

FRANKFORD, PHILADELPHIA, PA., December 31, 1908.

I, John Rogers, of 4151 Paul street, Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., was in the employ of the Aberdeen Comb Works Company, Aberdeen, Scotland, for forty-two years. During this time I worked in the various departments, and for a number of years I was employed as foreman.

The rates of wages paid by this firm at the time my employment with the said firm ceased were as follows:

Managers, average wages not over 60 shillings, or about $15 per week.

Foremen, average wages not over 25 to 30 shillings, or about $6 to $7.50 per week.

Men, average wages not over 16 to 27 shillings, or about $4 to $6.50 per week.

Women, average wages not over 8 to 12 shillings, or about $2 to $3 per week.

Boys, average wages not over 4 to 5 shillings, or about $1 to $2 per week; this latter rate gradually increasing as the boys reach manhood.

I have been in constant correspondence since I left Aberdeen with employees of the comb works who are my old friends and neighbors, and I am sure that rates have not advanced, but rather have decreased since that time.

JOHN R. ROGERS.

John Rogers, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that the facts set forth in the above statement, to which he has attached his signature, are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

JOHN R. ROGERS.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 31st day of December, 1908.

[SEAL.] THOS. B. FOULKROD, Notary Public.

Statement of G. W. Richardson Company, Newburyport, Mass. (Tariff Hearings, p. 7164):

"As women perform much of the heavy work in Scotland, for which we employ men at a rate of $10.50 to $13.50 per week, it is clear to us that the total labor cost in Aberdeen would not exceed 30 to 33⅓ per cent of what it is in this country.

"One of our principal items is a 7-inch metal guard tooth comb, with a metal back of nicolene. This comb has been copied by the Aberdeen people and is now sold in this country by them at $5.70 per gross, duty and freight paid.

"A fair price for this is from $7 to $7.50 per gross. The comb retails at 10 cents. The nicolene used in this article by the American manufacturer is increased in price by a duty of 45 per cent.

"The industry in this city gives employment to about 200 hands, which number might be materially increased if the American market could be retained for the American manufacturer."

Confectionery.

Statement of National Confectioners' Association of United States (Tariff Hearings, p. 3513):

"The cheapest wages paid in the United States vary from $3.50 per week to $6 per week, against $1.50 per week to $2.50 per week in England.

"The average wages paid in the United States vary from $10 per week to $15 per week, against $5 per week to $10 per week in England."

Coppersmithing and sheet-iron work.

Statement of Vulcan Copper Works Company, Cincinnati, Ohio (Tariff Hearings, p. 8020):

Report of Special Agent W. A. Graham Clark, Department of Commerce and Labor (United States Consular Reports):

"In the manufacture of cotton goods Germany holds third place, being only exceeded by the United Kingdom and the United States. In the exports of cotton goods Germany is only exceeded by the United Kingdom. In 1907 the imports of raw cotton amounted in value to $113,391,530, and the exports of cotton manufactures were valued at $97,002,136."

Writing of what he states to be the most important cotton mill in Germany, and also the best paying, as shown by its published dividends, the Augsburg Mechanische Baumwoll Spinnerei und Weberei at Augsburg, in Bavaria, Mr. Clark, speaking of the labor question, says:

"In regard to wages at this mill, the picker-room hands and the carders get 50 to 70 cents a day; on two 900 self-actor mules the spinner averages about 90 cents a day, the piecer 71 cents, and each of the two creelers 35 cents a day. Weavers, on an average, run three looms apiece, and make about 80 cents a day."

BAMBERG.

Report of United States Consul William Bardel on wages in the cotton mills of Bamberg (United States Consular Reports):

"The wages paid to foremen are from $47.60 to $83.30 a month; workingmen under 16 years of age receive from $2.18 to $2.86 a week; those over 16 years old from $4.28 to $7.14 weekly. Women over 16 years old earn from $2.15 to $3.15, while those under this age receive from $1.71 to $2.15 a week. Sixty-one hours constitute a working week."

HANOVER.

Report of United States consul on wages in the cotton mills of Hanover:

"The wages for spinners are 20 to 28 marks ($4.76 to $6.66) per week, and for helpers from 50 to 75 per cent of this. The self-acting spinning mill and water spinning mill, making yarn Nos. 4–36 and 8–32, respectively, have as tenders women only. The wages are 10 to 15 marks ($2.38 to $3.57) per week, and the same wages are paid in the department for washing, winding, and wrapping."

SILESIA.

Report of United States Consul H. L. Spahr on wages in cotton mills of Silesia:

"The cotton mills in Silesia number about a dozen for spinning and a score for weaving. In the former, overseers get from $5.36 to $7.38 weekly; male operatives average 55 cents daily, and female operatives 48 cents. The spinners work ordinarily ten hours a day, the weavers ten and one-half hours."

AUGSBURG.

Report of Consul-General Thomas W. Peters on wages in cotton industry in Augsburg:

"A number of large mills making cotton and linen goods are situated at Augsburg. The wages paid to the overseers and weavers range from $1 to $2.25 per day, while the unskilled workmen receive 75 cents."

AUSTRIA.

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages and labor conditions in Austrian cotton mills (United States Consular Reports):

"* * * From wage lists obtained at various mills it would seem that 50 cents per day might be taken as the average cotton-mill wage throughout Austria.

"As a fair example of an average mill, in respect to management and wages, I give the following detailed list of a 40,000-spindle, 900-loom Bohemian mill near Reichenberg:

"Picker room.—Per day, men, 48.7 cents; women, 34.5 cents.

"Cards.—One card grinder to every 20 cards, $4.06 a week; 1 can girl, 34.5 cents a day; 1 lapman, 48.7 cents to every 12 cards; 1 cleaner, 48.7 cents a day for every 24 cards.

"Draw frames.—Seven deliveries; paid 1.32 cents a hank for No. .13 hank sliver.

"Slubbers.—Pay, 4.47 cents a hank for No. .50 hank roving, and 5.48 cents a hank for No. .60 hank roving; the operative makes $3.25 to $4.46 a week.

"Intermediates.—Pay, 5.08 cents for 1.2 hank roving and 5.88 cents for 1.5 hank roving; make $2.84 to $3.85 a week.

"Fine frames.—Tenders, 4.87, 5.08, 5.28, 5.68, 5.88, and 6.09 cents per hank for Nos. 2, 2½, 3, 3½, 4, and 4½ hank roving. The fine frame tenders make $2.48 to $5.28 a week; they usually run 1 frame, but some run 2, and these make the higher wage. On the 40-fly frames at this mill there are employed 15 helpers to lay up roving, help doff, etc., at 30 cents a day.

"Ring spinning.—Each girl runs 1 frame of 450 spindles and does her own doffing. The girls of every 4 frames are supposed to work together when doffing. These spinners are paid per hank as follows: Nos. 10 to 22s, 3.41 cents; Nos. 24 to 28s, 3.65 cents; Nos. 30 to 36s, 3.84 cents; No. 40s, 4 cents; No. 44s, 4.12 cents; No. 46s, 4.30 cents.

"Mule spinning.—The mules at this mill are of 568 spindles each, and 1 spinner, 1 apprentice spinner, and 1 creeler run 2 mules (1,136 spindles). They are paid per 1,000 stretches, of 66 inches per stretch, as follows:

Pincops.	Spinner.	Apprentice spinner.	Creeler.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Nos. 6 to 9	13.86	12.67	8.42
Nos. 10 to 11	12.67	11.49	7.92

Nos. 15 to 22	11.69	10.47	7.41
Nos. 23 to 30	11.94	10.72	7.13
Nos. 31 to 42	12.77	11.49	6.90
Nos. 44 to 46	12.93	11.65	6.90
No. 50	13.28	12.02	6.90

EARNINGS OF THE VARIOUS OPERATIVES.

If one figures on a production, as they do here, of 5.84 hanks of No. 20s per ten hours, the spinner's wage is found to be 63 cents a day. Reelers are paid by the kilo (2.2 pounds); warpers run 1 machine each, and are paid by the 100 kilos (220.46 pounds) or 1,000 meters (1,090 pounds); spoolers are paid by the day and winders by the kilo. The rate of pay is so arranged that all of these earn from 41 to 49 cents a day.

At Pottsdorf, near Vienna, in a large mill having 52,000 mule spindles and 8,000 ring spindles, I found that on No. 44s there were required per 2 mules of 2,536 spindles 2 spinners, at $1.02; 1 piecer, at 61 cents; and 1 boy creeler, at 41 cents per day. At this mill the ring frames were 516 spindles each, and each girl ran 1 frame, did her own doffing, and made the usual 41 cents per day. * * * One carder, at 49 cents, and 1 boy, at 41 cents per day, attended to each 12 cards and did all the work except grinding.

I have made up the following table as showing wages and cost of living for six typical Austrian cotton mills. The table is prepared from unpublished statistics given me by the president of the Austrian Cotton Spinners, as being actual figures recently compiled by a member of his association and from statistics obtained personally:

HUNGARY.

Report of Special Agent Clark on cotton mill at Budapest (1908 and 1909):

"Picker hands.—Men, 2 crowns (crown=20.3 cents); women, 1.5 crowns a day.

"Cards.—2.6 crowns (8 cards to a man); card grinder, 4 crowns.

"Draw frames.—1.5 crowns on the average, paid by hank clock.

"Slubbers.—2 crowns a day average, paid by hank.

"Mules.—Two mules (2,000 spindles) on No. 20s require 1 spinner, at 5 crowns; 2 piecers, at 3.50 crowns; and 2 boys, at 2.50 crowns.

"Ring spinning.—Girls run one side of 200 spindles each, get off about 8 hanks a day, and are paid 1.2 crowns to 1.4 crowns a day; they do their own doffing.

"Reelers are paid by the pound and make 1.5 to 2 crowns a day.

"Weavers run mostly on Cabots; they are paid 2 crowns for 100 meters (meter=39.37 inches) of 15 pick (per quarter inch) goods, and other cloth in proportion."

ITALY.

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in one of the oldest cotton mills in southern Italy, located at Salerno:

"This company employs some 2,000 operatives, and the wages of the bulk of the employees average about 1½ francs, say 30 cents, a day of eleven hours.

"The regular weekly wages in American currency, based on the rate per day, except as stated, were about as follows:

Employees.	Per week.
General personnel:
1 manager, here called director, at 15,000 lire a year	$57.90
1 bookkeeper, at 5,000 lire a year	19.30
1 clerk at 5 lire and 3 clerks at 3.5 lire each	17.85
1 gatekeeper, at 2 lire	2.32
1 night watchman, at 2.5 lire a night (7 nights)	3.38
1 Sunday watchman, at 2 lire	2.32
2 boiler-room men, at 3.5 lire each	8.11
1 engineer, at 5 lire	5.82
1 machinist, at 6 lire, and 2 assistants, at 4 lire each	16.21
1 waste packer, at 2.5 lire	2.90
1 roll coverer, at 4 lire	4.63
1 general utility man, at 2.5 lire	2.90
Total, general personnel	143.64
Card room:
1 foreman, at 6 lire	6.95
1 assistant, at 3 lire	3.47
Picker-room force, 3 men, at 2.5 lire each	11.58
1 card grinder, at 5 lire	5.79
3 carders, at 2.5 lire each	8.68
3 draw-frame tenders, at 2 lire each	6.95
2 slubber tenders, at 2 lire each	4.63
4 intermediate tenders, at 2 lire each	9.26
9 fine-frame hands, at 2.25 lire each	23.45
2 roving carriers, at 2 lire each	4.64
Total, card room	85.40
Spinning room:
1 foreman, at 6 lire	6.95
1 assistant in charge of mules, at 5 lire	5.79
2 mule spinners, at 5 lire each	11.58
4 mule threaders, at 3 lire each	13.90
2 carriers and oilers, at 3 lire each	6.95
1 rope binder, at 3 lire	3.47
2 assistants on ring spinning, at 4 lire each	9.26
20 female spinners, at 2.2 lire each	50.95
16 doffers, at 1.25 lire each	23.16
4 apprentices, at 1 lire each	4.63
2 banders and oilers, at 2.5 lire each	5.79
1 baler, at 2.25 lire	2.61
Total, spinning room	145.04
Total wages, entire mill	374.08

Report of Special Agent Clark on other mills in Italy:

"In some mills I found that the day's wages for all persons in the spinnig room were based on a certain production from the room, and at the end of the week their wages per day were over or under the set day wage according to the total production obtained.

"In southern Italy the wages are lower than in northern Italy, and might be given as 1½ to 2 lire (29.1 to 38.6 cents) for the first, as against 2 to 3 lire (38.6 to 58 cents) for the latter, but wages vary so, even between mills on the same goods in the same locality, that this is very general. The country mills pay much less than the city mills, but as a rule the help is less efficient.

"The following is a daily wage table from a southern mill, as published by the Government; hours of work, 11; days worked in a year, about 300:

Workers.	1894.	1898.	1903.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Carding: Men	34.7	44.2	48.3
Fly frame: Women	15.4	21.2	27.0
Spinning:
Men	34.7	51.4	56.0
Girls	13.5-15.4	13.5-23.3	17.4-25.1
Cop winding: Women and girls	8.7-21.2	17.4-25.1	15.4-25.1
Twisters:
Men	34.7	53.1	54.0
Women	15.4	21.2	21.2
Spoolers: Women and girls	9.7-23.2	13.5-27.0	13.5-27.0

"The average daily wages paid in a country mill near Milan have gradually increased from 30.9 cents for men and 11.6 cents for women spinners in 1871 to 47.3 cents for men and 36.1 cents for women in 1907, while for weaving the wages have increased from 15.4 cents to 39.6 cents in the same period. The hours of labor have also been decreased from 12 to 10½ per day. The number of days worked per year is about 290."

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in a fancy weave mill in Turin:

"In the card room wages are as follows: Picker-room hands get 2 to 3 lire a day (lira=19.3 cents), carders get 2½ lire, and 3 carders and 1 card grinder run the 30 cards. Draw-frame tenders get 2 lire a day. Slubber tenders get 10 centessimi (about 2 cents) a hank, and the intermediate and fine frame tenders in proportion, so that their wages per day vary between 2 and 2.5 lire. On the spinning frames girls run from one to two sides, and are paid by the production, but wages average about 1 lira per 200 spindle side. For the 15,000 spindles there are 12 doffers, each under an assistant, the doffers getting 1.25 lire per day.

"Prices for weaving vary, so that figures without samples are of little value, but on the plain wides of 140 centimeters (55.12 inches) width the weavers get 5½ centessimi (1.06 cents) a meter (39.37 inches), and cuts run 50, 100, and 120 meters in length. On the narrow goods up to 75 centimeters (29.53 inches) the price averages about 3½ centessimi (0.68 cent) a meter. The wide looms are run 135 to 150 picks per minute, and the narrow looms 180 picks a minute. These prices correspond to about 1 cent a yard for 68-pick goods 55 inches wide, and about 0.6 of a cent a yard for 48-pick goods 30 inches wide. The weavers therefore make 2 to 2½ lire a day, a few getting as high as 3 lire."

Statement of Special Agent Clark in regard to employment of women and children in cotton mills of Italy:

"There is no law regulating the hours of labor per day or per week, but there is a law forbidding women and children to work at night. This law was passed in 1902, to take effect June 30, 1907, the five-year interval being allowed the mill men in which to double their plants. This was made necessary by the fact that the great bulk of Italian mill labor consists of women and children. The Government figures for 1903 showed the operatives in cotton mills to be 138,880, of which 34,335, or 25 per cent, were men; 82,056, or 59 per cent, were women; 4,739, or 3 per cent, were boys; and 17,750, or 13 per cent, were girls. These figures show that the women and children comprise three-fourths of the total employees."

SWITZERLAND.

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages per day in four large cotton mills in Switzerland (1908 and 1909):

It will be noticed that some of the mills show no doffers. In a good many cases none are employed, but each three spinners work together and doff their frames themselves.

EGYPT.

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in Egyptian cotton mills (1908 and 1909):

"English machinery is used throughout. The wages paid are high as compared with Indian mills and are steadily advancing from year to year. Men start in at 6 piasters (say 30 cents) and soon get 8 to 9 piasters (40 to 45 cents) a day and over. Women and men work together, and some young children are employed, both boys and girls. Spinners are paid by the day; in fact, reelers and weavers are about the only hands on a piecework system. A girl running two sides of warp gets about 25 cents, but on fine weft may get as much as 50 cents.

"The working hours are from 6 a. m. to 6.10 p. m. Hands are relieved in batches for ten minutes for breakfast and the mill stops an hour for dinner at noon, so that the operating time is only eleven hours a day."

INDIA.

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in cotton mills in India:

"Lapmen to bring in the laps receive the equivalent of 13 cents each a day. Flymen to remove the waste receive the same thing, boys to handle the cans receive 11 cents a day each, a head grinder and ordinary grinders receive 15 cents a day, and strippers receive the same pay. The strippers have one of the hardest jobs in the mill, having to strip each card every hour and a half, which keeps them very busy. An oiler receives 13 cents a day. The draw-frame tenders make about 13½ cents a day. The slubber price is about 18 cents a day. 'Intermediates' make about 17½ cents a day. Doffer boys get about 10 cents a day. The spinning is all done by men and boys. Each spinner is paid 11 rupees 8 annas a month of 26 days, or, say, 14 to 15 cents a day. The doffers get 10 cents a day. For running each two mules of 1,872 spindles on 20s there was required one spinner, who got about 27½ cents a day; five piecers got 15 cents a day each, and two creelers were paid 9½ cents a day. Reeling is the only work in most of the Indian mills that is considered to be a woman's job. The law prohibits women working in mills after 6 p. m. As most of the mills work until 7.40 p. m., women are usually confined to reeling only. The reeling wages are 0.7 of a cent for hand reels and 0.46 of a cent for power reels on 10s. This is a higher price than is usually paid in America, where one-third of a cent for reeling 10s is considered high. The work is a little different, however, as in America the length does not usually have to be so exact, and full bobbins are reeled at each doff."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I reprint here a brief statement made by me in the tariff debate of last year, which shows the effect of the protective tariff on the prosperity of our cotton mills and on the wages and hours of labor which concludes what I have presented on the cotton industry.

Mr. President, I wanted to call attention to a few facts in regard to the great cotton industry. In 1905 there were 310,000 people in the United States earning wages in the cotton industry. In Massachusetts there were 88,033 in 1905, and in 1900 there were 92,085. The maximum prior to 1905 was 100,982. The capital was $605,100,164. During this time, which has been a period of prosperity, until within a year, wages have been advanced in those industries, as I have shown, 32 per cent, and the hours of labor have been shortened in Massachusetts to fifty-six hours per week and to fifty-eight in the other New England States.

Mr. ALDRICH. To fifty-six in Rhode Island.

Mr. LODGE. To fifty-six in Rhode Island also. The wages paid out were $94,377,696, and, as I also pointed out, the increase since 1900 to 1905 was 10.9 per cent; that is, there was 2½ per cent increase in the number of wage-earners and an increase in wages of 10.9 per cent.

Under the general cotton products, we imported $31,869,000 worth; under cotton laces, $39,737,000; and under wearing apparel, $1,358,000, making a total of $73,964,000.

Mr. President, almost all of that could be made here without advancing prices to the consumer, if we can be allowed to take possession of our own market. There were 310,458 wage-earners in 1905. That means probably one million and a quarter people who derived their living from the mills. There are 155,000 in New England. There are 31,000 in the Middle States. There are 120,000 in the South. There are 2,000 in the Western States. That is a great body of people, Mr. President. We hear a great deal in this debate about consumers. All those people are consumers. They are also buyers. They buy rice with duty of 100 per cent. They buy tobacco, with its eighty-odd per cent duty. They buy all the articles of the agricultural schedule, and they do not complain.

Cutlery.

Statement of comparative wages in razor industry submitted by Geneva (N. Y.) Cutlery Company (Tariff Hearings, p. 2162):

	Weekly wages paid.
	Germany.	United States.
Forgers	$4.30 to $7.09	$15 to $21
Dry grinders	4.30 to 5.70	12 to 18

FRANCE.

Report of special agent of the Treasury Department on wages paid in the Thomson-Houston Works at Paris in 1909 (United States Consular Reports):

"The Thomson-Houston Works pay their employees, for the most part, by piecework. A working day involves ten hours. Work commences at 7 in the morning and continues until noon and is resumed at 1.15 p. m., the shops closing at 6.15 p. m. The operator at one of the Niles boring machines is averaging about 1 franc per hour (19.3 cents). At the Bullard boring mills the operators were receiving rates of pay varying from 90 centimes to 1.10 francs per hour. The men at the lathes and millers average between 85 centimes and 1.05 francs per hour. The grinding hands receive, at an average, 85 centimes per hour. Women receive for hand work between 40 and 50 centimes per hour (100 centimes=1 franc=19.3 cents)."

GERMANY.

Report of Special Agent Carden on wages in the Halske-Siemens-Schuckert Electrical Works, employing 25,000 persons (United States Consular Reports):

"The rate of wages paid by this firm is based largely on piecework, and for the summer of 1907 is illustrated by the following table (mark=23.8 cents):

	Average weekly wages.	Average hours per week.
		Hours.
Lathe hands	$11.04	57½
Vise men	9.60	56½
Drill-press men	8.16	57½
Planer hands	8.88	53½
Machine laborers	8.16	60½
Machine porters	6.96	63½
Tool-lathe makers	10.56	55½
Tool-vise hands	10.03	60½
Milling-machine hands	9.36	60½
Tool grinders	8.40	56½

Statement of Winchester Arms Company, New Haven, Conn. (Tariff Hearings, p. 2237):

"In the manufacture of guns two classes of machines are chiefly used the world over, viz, a standard form of Lincoln milling machine, and a so-called edging or profiling machine. In the ordinary manufacture these machines are run by operatives who are not mechanics and who have no actual trade. On the Continent milling-machine operatives, who form the larger proportion of those manufacturing guns, receive from $3.50 to $4.50 per week. In this country it is practically impossible to employ people for the same work at less than from $2.25 to $2.50 per day, or $13.50 to $15 per week; and the same is practically true of the wages of all other employees engaged in this line of manufacture. It is, therefore, safe to say that the continental labor cost is not over one-third of the domestic labor cost."

STATE OF NEW YORK, Tompkins County, ss:

Alfred Betts, being duly sworn, deposes and says: I came to the United States from England four years ago last September. Before that I worked at the gun business for about twenty years in Birmingham. I worked for Webley & Scott, Greener, and the Midland Gun Company. I had worked by the day and piecework, and I had employed others as a contractor. I therefore know what wages were paid to gun workers. The average wages of a skilled man like myself was about $7.50 per week. When I came to this country I could earn about $18 to $21 per week.

I am now working for the Ithaca Gun Company, and am making net from $20 to $24 per week.

My father and uncle were gun makers before me. My brother is a gun maker in England, and is able to make from $7 to $7.50 per week when he can get a full week's work.

Foundry and machine-shop work.

GERMANY.

Report of Special Agent Carden in regard to wages in the works of the Ludwig Loewe & Co. A. G. works at Berlin for year 1909:

"The rule at Loewe's calls for fifty-four hours of work per week per man, and the wages paid vary between 10.8 cents per hour for unskilled labor to 30 cents and even more for skilled men. The expert men are generally paid by piecework. The average rate of wages paid by the hour is as follows:

	Cents.
Foremen in the assembling department	19. 2
Vise men	14. 4
Skilled lathe men	15. 8
Skilled planing men	16. 8
Skilled milling-machine men	17. 2
Skilled men for boring mills	17
Skilled men for grinding machines	16. 8
Molders	17. 2
Core makers	14. 4
Carpenters	12. 7
Pattern makers	15. 6
Forge men	17. 2

The actual average rates of wages which have been paid in the foundry department are as follows:

	Cents.
125 hand molders	18
32 machine molders	15. 6
45 core makers (men)	17. 2
20 core makers (women)	8
34 cleaners (picklers)	14
6 apprentices	3. 4
125 workmen (varied help)	11. 5

Report of Special Agent Carden on wages in machine-tool plant of De Fries & Co., Dusseldorf, in 1909:

"The following table indicates the rate of wages paid skilled men in the De Fries shops:

	Cents per hour.
Lathe men	15. 6
Planer hands	16. 8
Milling-machine men	16. 8
Boring-mill hands	16. 8
Grinding-machine men	15. 6
Foremen	19. 2
Assembling-department hands	16. 8
Vise men, assembling department	16. 8
Molders	18. 0
Core makers	15. 6
Carpenters	16. 8
Pattern makers	19. 2
Forge men	19. 2

"The 300 machine tools constituting the equipment of De Fries & Co. are operated by approximately 200 machinists, constituting an average of 1½ machines per man. Twenty per cent of the 750 men employed represents unskilled labor. The work day is reckoned at ten hours and the average wages paid for unskilled labor is 9.12 cents per hour."

Reports of Special Agent Carden on wages in Italy, Switzerland, and Austria, 1909.

ITALY.

LEGNANO.

A few of the most expert men receive as high as 11 francs per day ($2.12), but only a very few, and the pay of a shop foreman is but little more. This is considered very good pay in Italy. For the majority of the men the pay ranges from 8 to 10 francs per diem ($1.54 to $1.93), with about 6 francs ($1.16) per day for the younger and less experienced employees.

SWITZERLAND.

ZURICH.

The following wages are paid: Fitters of the better class, $1.68 to $1.92 per day; skilled men on lathes, milling, and planing machines, $1.44 to $1.68; other than skilled men on drilling machines, capstan lathes, and small machines, $1.20; shopmen for varied sorts of work, 96 cents to $1.

AUSTRIA.

VIENNA.

The workmen are paid according to the amount of work performed. For each piece there is a fixed valuation, and the workman is paid whenever the work is completed. In case the task extends over a pay-day period advances are made. I was informed that some of the very best workmen receive as high as 10 crowns ($2.03) per day. The average rate of pay for good machinists varies from 6 to 8 crowns ($1.22 to $1.62) per day. Apprentices receive 1.7 crowns (34.5 cents) per day. A day's work at the Vulkan shops comprises nine hours and twenty minutes. The shops open at 7 a. m. and close at 6 p. m. (Saturdays at 4 p. m.), with an interval of ten minutes for breakfast and one and one-half hours for dinner.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN.

The average wages earned by good machinists varies from 13 to 16 cents per hour. In winter time a day's work comprises nine hours, and in summer time, ten hours.

Statement as to average American wages, submitted by Glen Knitting Company, Philadelphia, Pa. (Tariff Hearings, p. 4600):

"STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Philadelphia, ss:

"Personally appeared before me, a notary public, residing at Philadelphia, in and for said county and State, William S. Ash, secretary of the Glen Knitting Company, a corporation of Philadelphia, Pa., who, being duly sworn according to law, says: That the following list of wages paid at the present time at the hosiery mill of the above corporation at Philadelphia, Pa., was copied from the weekly pay roll of the said Glen Knitting Company, and is true and correct both as to the rates paid for piecework and as to the weekly averages earned by the different classes of operators; that the rates have been in force since April, 1907, and have not been reduced since then; that to the best of his knowledge and belief there is no material difference between the wages paid for the same kind of work in the different sections of the United States; and that the following schedule of the rates for piecework and the list of weekly averages constitute a fair basis for calculating the cost in the hosiery factories of the United States of such lines of goods as are coming in most direct competition with foreign, and especially German, goods:

(1) Average weekly wages paid:

Knitters (men)	$30. 00
Toppers (women)	8. 00
Loopers (women)	10. 00
Seamers (women)	10. 00
Menders (women)	10. 00
Finishers (women)	9. 00
Finishers (men)	14. 00

(2) Rates paid for piecework for 36-gauge ladies' hose:

Knitting legs	.25
Knitting feet	.11
Topping feet	.07
Looping	.005
Seaming	.075
Examining and mending	.04
Boarding	.055
Pairing and packing	.075
Other wages and salaries	.15
Total wages per dozen	.89

That the foregoing facts are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

SCOTLAND.

Affidavits of employees as to wages in lace mills of Scotland (Tariff Hearings, p. 4834):

In 1906 I worked at Goodall & White's, Glasgow, Scotland, as a lace weaver, working an 8-point 360-inch machine at the rack rate of 1¼ pence for ordinary double action and 2¼ pence for double-action madras. Previous to 1906 I worked for Muir Brothers, Newmilns, at the set wages of 26 shillings, where I learned the trade, working the first year for 18 shillings, the second year for 21 shillings, the third year for 24 shillings, and the fourth year for 26 shillings.

ALEX SMITH.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 3d day of December, A. D. 1908.

[L. S.] WILLIAM BUCKLEY, Notary Public.

Commission expires January 14, 1909.

The wages of Alex Smith for the weeks of November 21 and 28 were $29.85 and $25.05 (Thanksgiving week), working a total of seventy-six hours and making 448 racks.

Working by hours, Alex Smith averaged $27.76 per week of forty-four hours, or four and one-half times the time rate of Muir Brothers, Scotland.

Working by racks at the American rate of 0.1 per rack for 8-point 360-inch ordinary double action and 0.1121 per rack for double-action madras, he would have averaged for each week when making ordinary double action $8.40 in Scotland, as against $22.40 in America, or, if making double-action madras, $9.52 in Scotland, as against $25.11 in America. The American rate is 167 per cent higher than that of Goodall & White, Glasgow, on the ordinary double-action goods, and 164 per cent on the double-action madras goods.

In 1905 and 1906 I worked at Hood Morton's, Newmilns, Scotland, as a lace weaver, working an 8-point 360-inch machine, at set wages of 26 shillings per week of forty-four hours, the masters working the machines three shifts, or one hundred and thirty-two hours.

ALLAN ATHY.

The wages of Allan Athy for weeks ending November 14, 21, and 28 were $26.26, $24, and $19.45 (Thanksgiving week), respectively, working one hundred and forty-one hours. This is an average of $21.75 per week of forty-four hours, or three and one-third times what he was making in Scotland for the same number of hours.

GERMANY.

PLAUEN.

Reports of Special Agent Clark and United States Consul C. B. Hurst on wages paid in lace and embroidery industry in Plauen, 1908 and 1909:

"The wages paid to employees are small, according to American standards. While the many girls and women employed in the factories could earn as much in domestic service, they prefer the freedom and independence of factory life. Fifte n marks ($3.57) a week is considered good pay, and nearly all wages are reckoned according to the amount of work done.

"Most of the cutting off and fastening of threads is done at home by children and women, who can be seen by the score sitting on the doorsteps and all about outdoors at work with scissors and thread, surrounded by masses of delicate lace, or carrying through the streets their bundles of laces to and from the factories.

"With the highly developed machinery all the fine, handmade laces can be copied with marvelous accuracy, including Venetian point, Irish, Cluny, Brussels, and many others, as well as muslin embroideries and edgings of all sorts.

"Women and girls are employed very largely in the factories. The average wages paid to overseers range from 24 to 40 marks ($5.71 to $9.52) a week, only in rare instances higher than this. The wages paid to operatives, on an average, are nearly 16 marks ($3.81) a week. This latter rate was established the beginning of last year, when the average weekly payment was 13.99 marks ($3.33). The employers say that a number of the workmen do not earn the pay they receive in relation to the work done. Operatives are striving to have a minimum of 18 marks ($4.28) a week established. This is being strongly opposed by most manufacturers. Before the latest increase in wages was granted the operatives, both sexes, divided into four classes, earned as follows:

Class of weavers.	Wages per week.
	Marks.	Dollars.
Up to 16 years of age	10.28	2.47
From 16 to 21 years	12.96	3.08
From 22 to 55 years	16.08	3.83
Over 55 years of age	13.38	3.18

"There are, of course, exceptions in different places, and one finds wages in some cases as high as 18 marks ($4.28) per week being paid, which counterbalance some wages as low as 7 marks ($1.67) a week.

"The weekly wages for general scissor and needlework performed in factories is about $2.88. The man who owns the machine called the 'Lohnesticker,' working at home on regular designs and furnishing the yarn, etc., gets $30 for what costs him $28, leaving him only $2 profit on his machine for the week's work.

"The average stitcher gets probably $7.20 to $8.40 per week. The two girls on a machine, one to watch the work and the other to keep the small shuttles filled, are paid, respectively, $4.32 and $3.36 per week."

FRANCE.

CALAIS.

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in the lace and embroidery industry in Calais, 1908 and 1909:

	Francs.	Dollars.
Designer (first class)	100 to 300	19.30 to 57.90
Draftsman	75 to 200	14.50 to 38.50
Woman pointer	40 to 80	7.75 to 15.50
Card puncher	50	9.65
Card lacer	20	3.86
Warper on ground warps	50	9.65
Warper on small rolls for guimps, etc	30	5.79
Wheeleuse (bobbin filler)	35	6.75
"Remonteur," setting up design on machine	20	3.86
Mender	25	4.83
Folding, ticketing, etc	18	3.47

"In regard to other operatives, the girl overseer, who walks up and down the front of the machine to see that the needles are stitching correctly, keeps the needles threaded, corrects any slight defects found, etc., is usually paid 50 or 60 cents a day. The shuttle filler usually gets 40 cents a day. She keeps the schiffli shuttles supplied with the little 1-inch bobbins of yarn, and for ordinary work it takes a shuttle filler to a machine. The girls who inspect the cloth, those who repair defects with the sewing machine, and others get also from 40 to 60 cents. The superintendent of an 80-machine factory on fine goods that I visited got $80 a month, but $50 a month is about the average. The highest paid men in the business are the managers of the company and the designers, who are paid wages more nearly corresponding to what similar men would get in the United States."

SWITZERLAND.

ST. GALL.

Report of Consul-General S. C. McFarland on wages in lace and embroidery industry in St. Gall in 1909:

"Factory wages, small from an American standpoint, are perhaps the highest in Europe, as is also the standard of living. Foremen receive from $1.20 to $1.80 a day, expert stitchers from 90 cents to $1.90, ironers from 90 cents to $1, and less expert workers down to 60 cents."

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in lace and embroidery industry in St. Gall:

"The stitcher in St. Gall will make, say, $8 to $12 a week, in New Jersey $18 to $30; the girl overseer in St. Gall will be paid from 38 to 57 cents a day, in New Jersey from 85 cents to $1.35; the shuttle filler in St. Gall will be paid 38 cents a day, in New Jersey 75 cents. This is quite a difference and is especially important on fine embroideries, where the labor cost is really the controlling factor.

"On standard 4/4 goods it is usually considered that, taking into account the cost of yarn and power and the cost of living, a hand-machine worker can not make a profit if the stitch rate is under 33 centimes (centime=about one-fifth cent), but I visited homes where this work is now being done at 23 centimes. The only possible reason for this seems to be that the operative can not find work on his farm during the winter and had rather work on his machine, even at a slight loss, than to get out of touch with the men who supply him with his means of livelihood. In such case the stitcher figures the work of himself and family at nothing, and has to be satisfied if the price paid covers the cost of yarn and power."

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS.

Report of Consul-General Watts on lace and embroidery industry in Brussels:

"The majority of the lace makers earn from 50 to 85 centimes (about 10 to 17 cents) a day. Exceptionally good workers earn 1 franc (about 20 cents), and expert workers (of whom there are only 10 or 12 out of 15,000), 2 francs (38.6 cents) a day, for no matter what kind of lace."

Report of United States Consul Joseph E. Haven, 1909:

"There is no recognized wage scale in force in the silk and velvet mills in this district, each manufacturer having a standard of his own. The wages vary in the different departments, according to the skill of the several workmen. In the weaving department overseers receive from $5.95 to $7.14 a week, while laborers are paid from $5.71 to $6.18. In a few factories wages are paid according to piecework. Overseers in the winding and warping departments receive from $5.95 to $7.14 weekly; the laborers from $3.57 to $4.96. The employees in these departments are generally women. In the dyeing department overseers are paid $9.52 to $10.71, skilled labor from $7.14 to $8.33, and unskilled labor from $4.76 to $5.95. The overseers in the finishing department receive $8.33 to $9.52, and the laborers from $4.76 to $6.18."

DUSSELDORF.

Report of United States Consul Peter Lieder on wages in silk industry in Dusseldorf:

"In spinning mills, where only women are employed, the average daily wage is from 71.4 cents to 83.3 cents. Immediately after leaving school, usually at 14 years, the young girls enter the factories. In two years they earn from 35.7 cents to 47.6 cents a day, and after four or five years their wages are increased to the maximum of 83.3 cents. In weaving mills the salary undergoes many fluctuations, reaching as high as $1.19 per day. There are also many factories where workers are paid according to what they produce, and often make as much as $1.30 a day."

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages in the silk industry in Barmen:

"Wages in Barmen and the surrounding section are higher than in most other textile centers of Germany. Ordinary weavers will average 60 to 80 cents a day, and weavers on special work will get as high as $1.43 or more."

Statement of the E. Howard Watch Company, Waltham, Mass. (Tariff Hearings, p. 2522):

"DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry as regards average wages paid to workmen in our factory as compared with those paid in watch factories in foreign countries, would say we have employed in our factory 285 operatives, embracing both skilled and unskilled labor.

Skilled workmen, average per day	$4.50
Unskilled workmen, including girls operating automatic machines, etc., average per day	2.75
All others, including boys and girls, average per day	1.24
Total average of all classes per day	2.80

"To compare this with wages paid in watch factories in Switzerland, we would refer you to the report of Special Agent A. B. Butman, which appears on page 1 in the Daily Consular Trade Report of February 11, 1907, published by the Department of Commerce and Labor, Bureau of Manufactures, wherein he states that wages in the watch industry in Switzerland vary from 2.50 francs (50 cents) per day to 10 francs ($2) per day, the latter being for adjusters. It is well known that the adjusters receive much higher wages than anyone else in this industry, and in our own factory we have adjusters who are paid as high as $6 per day."

ENGLAND.

General report of Special Agent Clark on the woolen and worsted industry in England, November, 1908 (United States Consular Reports):

"The cost of manufacture of worsteds in England is about half of that in the United States. The number of operatives in the wool industry decreased in Great Britain from 301,556 in 1890 to 284,441 in 1901, the last year for which returns were made. In 1868 the flocks of the United Kingdom reached 35,600,000; in 1907 they were estimated at 29,500,000. Workers in the wool industry do not receive as high nor as regular wages as workers in the cotton industry. About 80 per cent of the cotton goods made in England is exported and only about 40 per cent of the wool goods. The average good wool sorter makes from $6.80 to $8 a week, according to the amount sorted in a day. An apprentice for a two-year period receives $2.40 a week the first year. During the second year he is put on piecework at the regular rate, but he has to return to the firm one-fourth of the wages paid. In a large mill near Bradford they require a full five years of apprenticeship, the wages varying from $1.92 a week for the first year to $2.16 the second, $2.40 the third, and $2.64 the fourth year. The apprentice then goes on piecework and get three-fourths of the regular wage paid by the firm for the fifth year.

"Over 24 per cent of the material used in manufacturing woolen goods in Great Britain in 1907 was shoddy; the amount used being 210,000,000 pounds. The women employed to sort the rags are paid by the week, wages ranging from $2.72 to $4.86. The rag machine, or devil, as it is called, requires what is known as the 'devil minder,' who is usually paid $5.35 a week. Usually one girl receiving $3.41 a week runs two 'scribblers' in the carding operations, and another girl at $3.65 a week runs two carders, while one card fettler at $4.86 a week has the care of adjusting and keeping up the two sets. In mule spinning one main piecer receives $6.32 per week, two piecers $4.36 each, and one boy $2.68 per week."

Report of Special Agent Clark on wages and cost of manufacture in Bradford, England (United States Consular Reports):

"I give below the average weekly wages paid workers in the Bradford district, showing the averages as furnished by the unions. The figures were furnished by the central office of the trades council at Bradford. This trades council represents, as they inform me, 21,000 workers:

Day sorters	$6.72
Piecework sorters	6.72 to $7.68
Wool washers:
Day work (55½ hours)	3.32 to 5.28
Night work (63½ hours)	3.32 to 6.00
Women on cards	2.88 to 3.36
Men willeyers and card "fettlers"	4.80 to 6.00
Women combers, day work	2.88 to 3.36
Men combers, night work	3.32 to 5.76
Box minders	2.88 to 3.36
Drawers	2.16 to 2.64
3 side spinners (72 to 160 spindles per side)	1.80 to 2.04
Half-time spinners	.36 to .84
Doffers	1.80 to 2.04
Warp dressers (men)	7.20 to 8.16
Warp twisters (men)	7.68
Women weavers on 2 narrow (40-inch) looms	1.92 to 3.84
Spinning overlookers	6.24 to 7.20
Assistant overlookers	4.80
Dyers (54 hours' work)	5.76 to 6.72

"Except where specially shown, as for instance fifty-four hours in case of dyers, the hours per week are fifty-five and a half, which is the legal limit for the work of women. Night work is always by men, women not being allowed to work between 9 p. m. and 6 a. m. The maximum weekly hours for half-timers between 12 and 14 years of age is thirty-two and a half. Where men only are employed, as for instance on night work, there is no legal limit."

VARIATION IN OPERATIONS.

The foregoing wages may be taken as typical of the Bradford worsted industry, but there is more or less variation between the mills in the town and in the country, and there is no uniformity even between two mills running side by side.

A manufacturer whose mill is in a small village about 10 miles from Bradford gave me the following as the wages now being paid in his mill and in four neighboring mills. He had just made these up to show his operatives, who had complained that they were not getting as much as those in some other mills, but when the figures were made up it was found that his mill (shown as No. 1) was actually paying in most cases more than neighboring mills and the discontent was quelled. The figures are as follows and show average weekly wages in five Bradford country mills:

	No. 1.	No. 2.	No. 3.	No. 4.	No. 5.

"The head overlooker in spinning at mill No. 1 (corresponding to boss spinner) was paid $19.44 a week. His assistant $11.52, and the other overlookers $8.40 a week. The warp twisters (men) at this mill averaged $7.20, the warp dressers $8.40, but work in this department was very irregular. When working the mechanics were paid $7.68, the head engineer $12, the head weaving overlooker $12.50, and the weaving overlookers $8.51 per week. Women spinners on frame spinning at Huddersfield earned $2.88 a week, and men spinners on the mule from $6 to $7.20.

"The weaving wage is the largest single wage item in making cloth. A Yorkshire expert who recently visited American worsted mills states that American worsted weavers averaged $12 to $15 a week and some run up to $24 a week. Similar weavers in Yorkshire average $3.16 to $4.13, with a limit for the best weavers on men's fine worsted of $7.29. He states that the American weavers as a whole probably average three times as much as Yorkshire weavers, and, contrasting the average manufacturing conditions in the United States with Huddersfield (the most highly paid section of the English wool industry), he obtains the following figures (for men's wide worsteds) as the total cost of manufacture: From raw material to finished cloth, United States, 1.5 cents per yard X picks per inch; Huddersfield, 0.75 cent per yard X picks per inch; from yarn to finished cloth, United States, 1 cent per yard X picks per inch; Huddersfield, 0.5 cent per yard X picks per inch.

"Such a comparison is bound to be more or less general, owing to the great variety of goods classed under the head of worsteds, but the author stated in private conversation that, from a contrast he made of figures obtained in the United States with figures in England in mills making the same class of goods, the American costs in most cases showed just about twice as high.

"Bradford is noted for worsteds for women's wear, and the weavers are women who average about $3.60 a week; but there are also in this district a good many mills making 'coatings' woven by men who average $4.86 to $6 a week.

"All the dyeing and finishing operatives are ordinarily paid by the hour or week. The girl menders are usually paid 4 pence (8 cents) an hour. The girl 'burlers' who inspect the cloth and remove small defects are usually paid by the hour, but in a good many cases by the piece. Their remuneration varies considerably, according to the goods and the care with which the work has to be performed, but an idea of their wages can be obtained from the fact that on men's fine worsteds they will get from 9 to 11 pence (18 to 22 cents) per 58-yard cut. On cheaper goods they will average about 4 pence an hour. The male 'miller' and the 'cloth scourer' will average about 5 pence (10 cents) an hour. Milled cloth ready for finishing is called here 'balk.' In the case of ordinary materials that call for no special skill, scourers, raisers, steamers, etc., will not make more than 20 to 22 shillings ($4.80 to $5.28) per week. On finer classes of work their wages will run up to as high as 30 shillings ($7.20) a week. The highest paid finishers are usually the foremen fullers and press setters, who will make from 31 to 37 shillings ($7.44 to $8.88) a week.

"The dyers are paid by the week. At the present time (October 21) their average wages in the Bradford district are about 26 shillings ($6.24), in the Leeds and Halifax districts 25 shillings ($6), and in the country districts 24 shillings ($5.76) per week."

GERMANY.

Report of United States Consul Robert J. Thompson on the woolen industry in Hanover, Germany (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

"There is one wool washing and dressing factory in this district employing 1,000 males and 800 females, ten hours constituting a day's work. Every department works with night shifts. The daily wages paid in this factory are as follows:

Description of work.	Males.	Females.
Yard work	$0.78
First sorting	.75	$0.46
Washing and carbolizing	.78
Second sorting	.75	.46
Second washing	.78

WEAVERS' WAGES AND MACHINERY.

The wages of foremen working in the principal corduroy and cotton velvet factory vary according to the wages of the male and female weavers working under them, and amount to about 30 to 40 marks ($7.14 to $9.52) per week. Other foremen and the master weavers get fixed weekly wages, varying from 24 to 80 marks ($5.71 to $19.04) according to the ability and the responsibility of the men.

The male and female workers in the weave room and in the shearing establishment do piecework and earn 15 to 28 marks ($3.57 to $6.66) weekly, according to their ability. One workman generally runs two looms; the more skilled run three. The men and women working in other branches of this establishment earn, on the average, about 3.30 marks (79 cents), according to the kind of work they do, per day of ten hours' work, viz, 6 to 8, 8½ to 12, 1½ to 6—that is to say, twelve hours with two hours of rest, as indicated.

Report of United States Consul Edward Higgins on wages paid in the woolen yarn industry in Stuttgart (United States Consular Reports):

"The wages paid overseers vary from 120 to 200 marks ($28.56 to $47.60) per month. A female operative earns from 2 to 2.8 marks (47½ to 66½ cents) per day and a male operative from 3 to 4.3 marks (71 cents to $1.02) per day. Eleven hours a day constitute the regular hours of labor for six days in the week."

Report of United States Consul E. T. Liefeld on wages in woolen mills of Freiberg (United States Consular Reports):

"Ordinary laborers in the mills are paid from 48 to 71 cents per day, their overseers from 71 cents to $1.20, while skilled laborers are paid as high as 95 cents, and their overseers $1.67."

FRANCE.

AIX LA CHAPELLE.

Report of United States consul at Aix la Chapelle on wages in woolen mills of that city (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

"The foreman of the spinning department (spinning master), from $9 to $14; the operatives, from $5 to $6; and other help, mostly girls, from $4.50 to $5 per week.

"The foreman of the weaving department (weaving master), from $9 to $14, and the regulators or setters, from $7 to $10.50 per week. Weaver are paid $5 to $9 per piece, and if capable and diligent can finish one and a half pieces of 43.6 yards at $5, or one piece at $9 each week. They earn on an average $1 to $1.40 per day. * * * The mistress of the darning department receives from $8 to $10 and her assistants from $5 to $7 per week."

Statement of Thomas H. Ball, Philadelphia, Pa., in regard to wages in Woonsocket, R. I., and France and Belgium (Tariff Hearings, p. 5766):

"Comb minders receive in England $4.30 to $4.75 per week, as against $6.50 to $8.50 in our mills here; drawers receive $2.80 to $3 in England, as against $6.50 to $7 here. Boys, $2.12 to $2.24 in England, as against $4 to $5 here. Girls in spinning rooms receive $2.24 to $2.75 in England, as against $5 to $7 here.

"In regard to the French system of spinning, the writer represents Jules Desurmont & Sons, Tourcing, France, who have recently established a branch at Woonsocket, R. I., and the figures below are the wages paid by this concern in Woonsocket and in their mill in France.

"Wages paid here for spinners, $16 per week; in France, $6.50 per week. Piecers, paid here $12 per week; in France, $4.50. Drawing hands, $6.50 here; in France, $3.25. Twisting, spooling, and reeling, $6.50 here, and $3.25 in France.

"Being interested in some mills in Belgium, are in a position to state with full knowledge that the wages in Belgium on this line of work is on an average of 5 per cent cheaper than in France, and in Germany on this same line of work the wages rule from 10 to 20 per cent lower than in France."

Mr. LODGE. The building trades, including bricklayers, masons, carpenters, plumbers, plasterers, painters, stonecutters, glaziers, roofers, and paper hangers, are not included among the protected industries. But they are really as much concerned in the maintenance of the protective tariff as those whose product and wages are directly protected by tariff duties. The reasons for this are obvious. If there was a general reduction in the wages paid in the protected industries brought about by lowering tariff duties and admitting unrestricted foreign competition, the general wage scale of the United States would go down in the building trades and in all other employments. The closing of factories, the cessation of all growth in the protected industries would increase the number of those seeking employment elsewhere, in the building trades and all other occupations. The removal of the protective duties would force wages in the protected industries down toward, if not actually down to, the foreign level, and wages in all other trades and occupations would inevitably follow the decline and sink toward the rates of foreign wages in those trades and occupations. It is therefore in the immediate interest of all who are engaged in the building trades in the United States to examine the rates of wages paid abroad in the same trades and compare them with the wages which they now receive under the protective tariff, which encourages manufactures and increases the opportunities of labor by multiplying and diversifying industries.

Mr. LODGE. Railroads are not among the protected industries as railroads are obviously not imported, and yet the railroad men of the country are actually as much interested in the tariff as those who earn wages in the protected industries. The earnings of railroad men are directly involved in the earnings and business of the railroads. If the railroads do not earn money the wages of those they employ are certain to be affected. If the protected industries, the local manufactures, are forced by foreign competition to close or reduce production, while through business on the railroads may not be seriously affected local freights will be affected very greatly, local business will fall off and the earnings of the railroads will be largely reduced, with the inevitable result of lowering railroad wages.

Both steam railroads and street railways would also be affected by anything which reduces employment and lowers wages in the protected industries. The reduction of employment and the lowering of wages in the protected industries by foreign competition, which is fostered by tariff reductions, will lower the wage scale of the entire country and force the labor now engaged in our industries to seek employment at almost any rate from the railroads and street railways of the country. For these reasons I give tables which show the wages of railroad and street railway employees abroad so that they may be compared with those paid in this country, and that our railroad men may realize what the effect of foreign competition, if freely admitted to this country, would be upon their wages.

Statement in New York Tribune as to wages and costs of living in Germany and the United States, 1909:

WHAT LABOR SPENDS—WORKERS' STANDARD OF LIVING IN GERMANY AND UNITED STATES.

A recent issue of the Labour Gazette of the board of trade, London, England, gives the result of an inquiry made by the imperial statistical department at Berlin into household expenditures of families of small means in Germany. The report was based primarily on returns from about 1,000 families living in Berlin and Hamburg.

The average yearly income for the skilled workmen who reported was found to be $458.83, and the average expenditure $457.71, of which 51.5 per cent was spent for food alone. Among the unskilled laborers in both industrial and commercial occupations the report showed an average yearly income of $409.78 and an average yearly expenditure of $411.70, 54 per cent of which went for food alone.

A recent study of the standard of living in New York City, made under the Sage Foundation, led to the conclusion that it was impossible for a family of average size, five or six, to maintain a normal standard of living on an income under $800 a year. This conclusion has been substantiated by an investigation by the federal Bureau of Labor, which showed that the average income among 1,415 workmen in the North Atlantic States, among whom the percentage of skilled labor was high, was $834.83. Against this was an average yearly expenditure of $778.04, of which only 43 per cent was spent for food.

An investigation by the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, made less than a year ago, showed that among 1,000 men who had been compelled to ask for aid the average yearly wage, when employed at full time, varied from $575 to $525, as the times were good or bad. The men were practically all able-bodied family men, anxious to work. The percentage of skilled and unskilled laborers in the thousand was about equal.

BELGIUM.

Report of United States Consul W. P. Atwell (United States Consular Reports, Nov. 2, 1909):

"Consul W. P. Atwell, of Ghent, furnishes the following rates of daily wages paid to a group of 613,000 workers, men and women, in various industries in Belgium: Earning less than 38 cents, 170,000; earning from 38 to 57 cents, 172,000; earning from 57 to 77 cents, 169,000; earning over 77 cents, 102,000."

Report of Special Agent Butman as to wages and hours in Belgium (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

"The hours of labor in Belgium are very long. The laborer commences work at 6 a. m. and ceases work at 7 p. m., with the usual breaks for meals. He is paid, according to the trade in which he is employed, on the average 7 cents to 9 cents per hour for ten hours and for additional two hours 25 per cent increase, making his daily wage from 84 cents to $1.08 for twelve hours. Children begin their life work at the age of 12 years; and as regards hours for child labor, the law states that no child under 16 years of age shall be kept at work for more than twelve hours a day. A Belgian statistician estimates the average earnings of an artisan at about $160 per year, which includes child labor."

JAPAN.

Report of United States consul on wages at Osaka, October 6, 1909:

"In the clothing, hat-making, embroidering, umbrella-making, and shoemaking industries a recent decline of 5 to 6 per cent is reported. The Osaka Asahi gives figures of daily wages which, reduced to United States currency, are as follows:

"Opticians and lapidaries, $1; masons, 70 cents; fireworks makers, 60 cents; shipbuilders, 75 cents; carpenters, assistants, 45 cents; European umbrella makers, 17 cents; soap makers, 7½ cents; printers, 8½ cents. In the case of female operatives the lowest rates are 7½ cents for weaving and tortoise-shell workers and 5 cents for umbrella sewers.

"Among those that are paid by the month are saki brewers, who receive $3.49, plus food; watch menders, $7.47, plus food; and saddle and harness makers, $10.46, plus food. Ordinary domestic male servants receive monthly $2.74, on an average, and female servants from $1.74 to $2.49, exclusive of food."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, public attention has been very naturally and very properly directed of late to the advance in prices, and the consequent advance in the cost of living. Very naturally, too, the interest in this important question has been largely concentrated on the prices of the necessaries of life, and, above all, upon the prices of those necessaries which are known as "foodstuffs." The question, as a whole, is too important, too complex, and too large to be dealt with without a due consideration of the many elements which enter into the determination of the cost of living. In order to come to an intelligent judgment it is necessary to ascertain, first, whether the advance in prices is of recent origin; second, whether it is peculiar to this country or exists elsewhere; third, whether it has affected all articles or only certain classes; and lastly, whether it is due to natural economic causes or to artificial and temporary causes, or whether causes of both kinds have been at work in a greater or less degree. In order to determine the first two questions it is necessary to examine the course of the world's prices, and this can be done by studying the Sauerbeck tables of world prices, which are published monthly by the Royal Statistical Society in England. Last summer during the tariff debate I took up this subject and showed from these tables the course of prices during the last eleven years. I will reprint here what I then said. I ask permission to print it without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, and permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A great deal has been said in this debate about prices and the effect of the tariff in keeping them up, as if we were the only country that had witnessed of late an advance of prices. As a matter of fact, the advance of prices since the great depression of 1893 to 1897 has been world-wide. I have here a brief table which I have compiled from Sauerbeck's table of world prices, which appears in the London Statistical Journal every month. They take as a basis 100, as is always done in these calculations. This basic figure is the average of prices from 1867 to 1877, and on that basis they show the rise or fall of the world's prices since. Taking the world's prices in vegetable food, corn, and so forth, in 1896 it was 53; in 1906 it had risen to 62; in 1907 to 69. It is interesting to observe that the next year it was 70. It had not fallen. Animal food, meats, and so forth, was 73 in 1896, and it has gone to 89 in 1908; sugar, coffee, and tea have fallen from 59 in 1896 to 48 in 1908. The world's price is 11 points lower. The total food has gone from 62 to 72. That includes the great fall in sugar, coffee, and tea. Minerals rose from 63 in 1896 to 101 in 1906, to 107 in 1907, and fell off heavily in 1908, dropping to 89. The textiles went from 54 in 1896 to 80 in 1906, to 77 in 1907, and 62 in 1908. Sundry materials went from 63 to 73; total materials from 60 in 1896 to 74 in 1908. The grand total of the world's prices from 61 in 1896 went to 77 in 1906, 80 in 1907, and was 73 in 1908.

The table referred to is as follows:

Prices.

[Basis, 100. Average per cent prices from 1867–1877.]

World's prices.	Years.
	1896.	1906.	1907.	1908.
Vegetable food (corn, etc.)	53	62	69	70
Animal food (meat, etc.)	73	89	88	89
Sugar, coffee, and tea	59	46	48	48
Total food	62	69	72	72
Minerals	63	101	107	89
Textiles	54	80	77	62
Sundry materials	63	74	78	73
Total materials	60	83	86	74
Grand total	61	77	80	73

That table shows a great rise in the world's prices. The advance was 20 points up to 1907, when it was checked by the business depression. But it has been a constant and steady rise. What is the cause of this world movement of prices? We are apt to forget that there is a force at work pushing prices upward all the time which is far greater and more powerful than any tariff, and which is but little considered. If I should say to the Senate that if we were to issue $500,000,000 of paper money prices would rise, everybody would know that I was speaking the exact truth. But people do not stop to consider that we have been inflating the world's currency by $200,000,000 of gold a year more than in 1896 ever since the new processes of gold discovery were found. I give here the coinage of the United States and of the world:

Gold production of United States.

1896	$53,088,000
1897	57,363,000
1898	64,463,000
1899	71,053,000
1900	79,171,000
1901	78,666,700
1902	80,000,000
1903	73,591,700
1904	80,464,700
1905	88,180,700
1906	94,373,800
1907 (estimated)	89,020,399

Circulation per capita.

1896	$21.41
1897	22.87
1898	25.15
1899	25.58
1900	26.94
1901	27.98
1902	28.43
1903	29.42
1904	30.77
1905	31.68
1906	32.32
1907	32.22

Gold production of the world.

1896	$202,251,000
1897	236,073,000
1898	286,879,000
1899	306,724,000
1900	254,576,000
1901	260,992,000
1902	296,737,000
1903	327,702,000
1904	347,377,000
1905	377,647,000
1906	400,342,000
1907	410,555,000

Coinage of the world.

1896	$195,899,000
1897	437,722,000
1898	395,477,000
1899	466,110,000
1900	354,936,000
1901	248,093,000
1902	220,405,000
1903	240,499,000
1904	455,427,000
1905	245,954,000
1906	366,326,000
1907	411,803,000

The gold production of the world went from $202,000,000 in 1896 to $410,000,000 in 1907. The coinage of the world went from $195,000,000 in 1896 to $411,000,000 in 1907. The circulation per capita of the United States went from $21.41 in 1896 to $32.22 in 1907. We increased our circulation in the United States 50 per cent in the period that has elapsed since 1896. In thirteen years we added 50 per cent to our coinage.

The gold production of the world has doubled. I am speaking of the annual production, not of the total, of course. The annual coinage has doubled. The result is that you are cheapening your standard all the time, and cheapening your standard means of course that you are advancing the price of everything that it measures. Therefore, Mr. President, when we come to talk about the advance in prices, it is well to remember that there is this great force of increased and increasing gold all the time pressing upon us. During these thirteen years, with our balance of trade standing as it has, we have kept in this country practically all the gold we have produced. The amount that goes into the arts is small and constant. The balance has been poured into the circulation. Of course, prices have advanced. Prices may fluctuate and go back a little one year, but the general movement is certain. The only thing that can stop the operation of the increasing gold coinage is where you have an oversupply of any article. If you have too much of any given commodity for the world's consumption, the increase of gold can not carry up the price. That is shown in the case of sugar. There is more sugar produced than the world can use. The result is that the world's price of sugar has been declining in the face of this general rise of prices.

Prices have risen in Europe, but labor has not risen in Europe, for the same reason that sugar has not risen—because there is an oversupply. We were shown the other day a report of the George Peabody fund in London, which rents homes to working people. It rents them. It is not a charity in any sense. This report shows that they have over 19,000 people living there, and the heads of the families are engaged in skilled trades. They are not the poorest class or the workers on the streets; they are skilled mechanics. The average weekly earnings of the head of each family in residence at the close of the year was £1 1s. 9d. In the cases in which the governors pay the rates the average weekly charge, including the rates, of each dwelling was 5s. 4d. a week, and of each room 2s. 4d. The rent in all cases includes the free use of water, laundries, sculleries, and bathrooms. The mean population during the year was 19,914, showing a density, after taking into account the occupied portion only of the Herne Hill and Tottenham estates, of 571 people to the acre, or 9 times that of London. An average wage of $5.25 a week among skilled mechanics, taken at hazard from all trades in London, gives a vivid idea of this labor with which our labor would have to compete if it were not protected by the tariff.

Mr. President, what is the use, in the face of facts like these, of talking about wages being the same there as here? The reason why the increase of gold does not affect those wages abroad is because there are more men than there is work for them. If you apply it to the labor in this country, you will find that with the gold force bringing with it increased prices, bringing with it prosperity, if you please, wages go up in the same way, because the supply of labor is not excessive. I have shown you what the advances in wages were in the New England mills. The mills had prospered, and the advance in wages was 32 per cent. It is the same in the woolen mills. The figures are all printed in the tariff hearings. The Government Manufacturing Bulletin of 1905 shows that the wages in the cotton industry in those five years, from 1900 to 1905, had risen 10 per cent. The wages abroad have not risen as they have risen here. Therefore, when we meet foreign competition, we are meeting a competition in which we are fatally handicapped by a lower rate of wages if we meet it on equal terms of tariff. We have to pay more for what we consume because gold is carrying up the price of all articles throughout the world. Look at the figures I gave of the food products. In 1908, textiles fell, minerals fell, materials fell, but the food products of the world did not fall. With the great depression of business, which was world-wide, the food products—animal food and vegetable food—absolutely gained a point in the teeth of the depression of last year. Mr. President, in talking about prices let us be fair. Prices are not going to be affected materially by the tariff. The things that cost the people most, the absolute necessaries of food, are not going to be got rid of by a change in the tariff.

I have, also, two tables of American prices, and I will print them both. One covers the textiles, the other food. I have made as complete a list as I could, from the figures of our Bureau of Statistics. Clothing, which is of course a protected industry, including manufactures of cotton and woolen manufactures, I have here in detail. It shows an average increase in the last ten years of 15.23 per cent, but during this same period the food products show an average increase of 26.48 per cent. This shows how little, comparatively speaking, the food products are affected by the tariff.

The one great food product that is materially affected by the tariff is sugar. The world price of sugar has declined, and all the protection we have had has been unable to force the price of sugar beyond a certain point; that is, the price of imported sugar duty paid. It has remained at a low point with only slight fluctuations.

The lists are as follows:

Clothing.

Mr. LODGE. The figures for the year 1909, which of course did not exist last summer, are not yet complete, but an extract from the London Economist, which I have here, shows what might have been expected with the revival of business. The steady advance in the world's prices, which was checked by the depression of 1907 and 1908, has again been resumed. I ask leave to print the extract referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The extract referred to is as follows:

The rise in the level of prices which our index number has indicated continuously since the end of March is still unchecked, and the increase in December is the biggest change of the whole year, the aggregate number rising from 2333 to 2390. In so far as this rise comes from a stronger demand for raw materials it is altogether satisfactory, and there are points in the month's history of prices which do suggest a very welcome recovery; there is a better market for most metals, including iron, copper, tin, and lead; and as the price of wheat is no higher the consumptive power of the population has not been reduced. Unhappily, however, the greater part of the rise is still due to cotton, and at the end of December the quotation for raw cotton was the highest of the year, while yarns and fabrics had risen slightly during the month, though the increase in them was not proportionate to the increase in the raw material. The following table shows the movements in our Index Number for several years:

End of December, 1902	2003

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Sauerbeck tables just given show that the advance of all prices has been world-wide. Therefore this general advance of all prices must be due to world-wide causes, is not confined to any one nation, and can not have been produced solely or even chiefly by conditions, laws, or rates of tariff duties in any one country. The two conditions of world-wide extent which would produce the steady advance in world prices of the last ten years would be an increase in the standard of money, by which prices are measured and an increased demand. The activity in business and the general improvement in standards of living, which have been apparent during most of the period under consideration, are evidence of an increased demand for commodities. The tables of gold production and gold coinage show the increase of amount in the standard of money by which the value of all commodities is measured. Therefore, it may be safely said that the two causes needed for an advance of the world's prices were both present during the period under consideration. It is not necessary to show the effect of an increased demand upon any article or upon all articles, because everyone understands what the effect of an increased demand is in raising prices. But it may be well to point out a little more explicitly the effect of an increase in the world's supply of gold.

Gold is the standard by which other commodities are measured. If gold grows scarcer and dearer, all other commodities fall in price. If on the other hand gold increases more rapidly than the demand of business and the arts requires, it will become cheaper and more plentiful, and the prices of all the other commodities which it measures will rise. Let me give a concrete illustration. Suppose that the crop of wheat is a hundred million bushels, worth a dollar a bushel. If next year the crop fails and amounts to only 50,000,000 bushels, the demand being unchanged and the gold by which it is measured remaining the same, it is obvious that the price of wheat will double. If instead of one hundred the crop rises to two hundred million bushels, the demand and the gold being unchanged, then wheat will fall to 50 cents a bushel. Now reverse this process. The crop and the demand remain the same, but the gold doubles. There will be $2 of gold to buy each bushel of wheat, instead of one, and wheat will rise, as compared with gold. Roughly stated, this has been the effect of the gold increase on world prices.

Having established the fact that forces of world-wide extent have been at work in bringing about a general advance of all prices, the next point is to consider what other elements may have entered into the advance of prices in this country in addition to the general causes common to all the world. An examination of the tables reveals the fact that while all prices advanced up to 1907, there was a marked decline in 1908, owing to the business disturbances of the previous year. The advance in all prices was then checked, and a serious decline took place in all, with a single exception—the prices of articles of food did not decline; while everything else fell. They even advanced, although not seriously. To repeat what I have already pointed out, while minerals fell 18 points, textiles 15 points, and all materials 12 points, vegetable food, including corn and wheat, advanced 1 point; animal food advanced 1 point, and sugar, coffee, and tea, which had been declining during the whole period, owing to the overproduction of sugar, remained the same in 1908 as it had been in 1907.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Are those world prices?

Mr. LODGE. Those are world prices.

This brings us to a consideration of the local causes in the United States which may have influenced the advance in prices in certain articles or in certain classes of commodities. Local causes, artificial or temporary in their nature, or both, may be conveniently divided under four heads—combinations to advance or maintain prices through the agreement of those who deal in the commodities, accidental scarcity, retailers' profits, and tariff duties. There can be no doubt that the first and third have both affected the price of certain articles, but it is not my purpose here to go beyond the single question of the effect of tariff duties. It is very important to determine so far as we may what the effect of tariff duties is upon the advance in prices in the United States in order to decide what, if anything, can be done by wise legislation to keep the cost of living within reasonable bounds.

Where a tariff duty is imposed for the purpose of establishing a new industry, as in the case of the tin-plate duties of 1890, there is no doubt that the first effect is to advance the price of the commodity. When the industry is fully established, however, domestic competition lowers the home price, and the creation of the new industry, which adds to the world's supply of the article, reduces the world's price. This has occurred again and again, and it is not necessary to cite examples of this well-known process. Where duties are imposed upon articles which are produced by industries already established the article thus protected against foreign competition may cost more or, owing to domestic competition, less than the foreign article. In the latter case the removal or reduction of the duty would have no effect; in the former case the reduction or removal of the duty would either stop the home industry or would compel the production of the article at a lower cost—that is, at lower wages for those engaged in the manufacture. In that case the lower price would be obtained, but at the cost of lower wages and a diminished purchasing power in the United States. Lastly, there are the articles upon which a tariff duty is imposed which this country exports and would not import under any system of duties, because we have a surplus for sale. Under this last head come practically all the food products, both vegetable and animal, and the removal of duties on food products would obviously have little or no effect upon the prices of articles of food, because we export such articles and can sell them in the world's market at a profit. If the prices of articles of food are excessive, as is no doubt the case in many instances, the cause of the excessive price must be looked for not in the tariff, but in combinations to advance prices artificially, and in the cost of distribution, or in what is commonly called the "retailers' profits."

Let me show by two concrete instances how absolutely without effect on prices in most directions the tariff is. There is no duty upon cotton, and has not been for half a century, yet nothing has been more marked during the last decade than the almost spectacular advance in the price of raw cotton. Short crops have occasionally had a temporary influence in this advance, but the great and steady rise in the price of cotton can not possibly be due to the tariff, for there is no tariff, and must be attributed to the two world-wide causes which I have already pointed out—increased demand for cotton goods and an increased gold supply.

In the tariff just enacted, hides of cattle were placed upon the free list and the duty on boots and shoes was reduced from 25 per cent to 10 per cent ad valorem. If a reduction of tariff duties is to bring a lowering of prices, we certainly had a right to look for this result in the case of hides and boots and shoes, and yet the precise opposite happened. Hides and boots and shoes have both advanced since the duties upon them were reduced by the last tariff. This proves that the prices of hides and of boots and shoes were world's prices, governed by world-wide causes.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I am very much interested in the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. I will ask him, along that line, if he remembers what the effect, in early times, was of the changing or removal of the tariff on coffee?

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall exactly. I have not looked up that point.

Mr. WARREN. My information is that the same thing occurred as has taken place on all other articles from which the United States has removed the tariff. When this country has removed the tariff, in some instances, other countries have imposed export tariffs, and in all cases the price of the article here has risen rather than fallen. The fact the Senator has just cited, in the case of boots and shoes and hides, after lowering the tariff upon boots and shoes and harness and taking it off entirely from hides, proves absolutely the correctness of the statement of the Senator. I think it has been true in all cases.

Mr. LODGE. I think so. Of course if the tariff had been added to the price of the article, the removal of the duty should have reduced its price. Instead of that the opposite has occurred.

I think I have shown that there is only one class of articles where the tariff affects the price. There are certain protected industries, almost all among the smaller industries, engaged in the production of articles which are not absolute necessaries, where the removal of the protective duty would result in the lowering of the price by the substitution of the foreign article for the domestic. If this substitution takes place the articles in question will no longer be made here and just so much American labor will be thrown out of employment. If the substitution does not take place the American article must be brought down to the price of the foreign article, and that means that the labor cost, or in other words, the wages of those engaged in the industry, must be reduced to the foreign level. To secure a reduction of prices in articles which are not as a rule the necessaries of life, by reducing American wages or throwing American labor out of employment, seems a very poor exchange.

It only remains now to determine by comparison whether the prices of the necessaries of life are higher here than in other countries, and whether they are lower in Great Britain, the one free-trade country, than in the United States and the protective countries of Europe. For this purpose I have compiled the tables which follow. It is very difficult to obtain statistics of prices ranging over any considerable period or covering fully any market. I have gathered the figures which follow from such official sources as I could find, and imperfect as they are I think they throw a great deal of light on the question of prices and demonstrate, first, that a tariff has little or no effect on the general prices of necessaries, and, second, that although world prices have advanced, prices of the necessaries of life are not, as a rule, higher in the United States than elsewhere, and in many cases are lower.

I ask leave to print as part of my remarks these tables, for I do not wish to weary the Senate by reading them, as they are all statistical. I give first foreign prices and then American prices from the daily market reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The matter referred to is as follows:

England.

[Statement from the London Express for November, 1909.]

A volume of statistics issued on Saturday from the board of agriculture is a damaging answer to the claims of the free traders that food prices remain almost stationary in a country without tariffs.

One of the many promises made by the Liberals before the last general election was that under a free-trade government the price of the necessities of life could not increase, and that tariff reform meant dearer food. These statistics show conclusively that it is free trade that means dearer food. In the last three years the price of nearly every article of food has increased. Here are some cases where the prices have gone steadily upward:

	Increase. s.	d.
Wheat (quarter)	3	9
Bread (4-pound loaf)		½
Beef (hundredweight)	3	0
Pork (hundredweight)	3	6
Butter (hundredweight)	4	6
Potatoes (ton)	20	6

Wheat.—Taking first the case of wheat. The returns are only compiled to the end of 1908, and therefore do not show the great increase that took place this summer, when wheat reached the astonishing price of 48s. a quarter.

The average price of wheat in 1908 was 32s. a quarter, or 1s. 5d. more than in 1907, and higher than in any previous year since 1898.

Only twice in the last twenty years has wheat reached an average of 32s. a quarter.

Bread.—The price of bread, of course, increases with that of wheat, and the figures show that since 1906 the increase has been equal to an extra half-penny on the 4-pound loaf. A half-penny on every loaf is a great hardship to the poor and makes an enormous difference in the working man's budget. The following table shows the increase:

	March.	June.	September.	December.
London:	Pence.	Pence.	Pence.	Pence.
1906	5.44	5.35	5.33	5.09
1908	5.85	5.85	5.75	5.78
England and Wales:
1906	5.15	5.14	5.14	5.07
1908	5.81	5.63	5.59	5.60
Scotland:
1906	5.71	5.68	5.41	5.37
1908	6.25	6.23	6.22	6.22
Great Britain:
1906	5.35	5.34	5.23	5.18
1908	5.97	5.85	5.82	5.83

Meat.—The rise in the price of beef has been just as remarkable as in the case of bread. While beef fell slightly between 1904 and 1906, it has risen rapidly in the last three years. Since 1904 Scotch beef has gone up from 55s. to 58s. a hundredweight, and English from 51s. 6d. to 54s. British pork has risen from 52s. to 55s. 6d. and Irish pork from 57s. 6d. to 64s. English mutton rose from 69s. a hundredweight in 1904 to 71s. in 1907 and fell last year to 69s. again. The following tables show some of the remarkable rises in the last three years:

Description.	Quality.	Per hundredweight. 1906.	1907.	1908.
Beef:		s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
Scotch short sides	1	61 6	62 6	60 0
Do	2	58 0	59 6	63 0
Scotch long sides	1	53 6	55 0	58 0
Do	2	50 0	51 6	54 0
English	1	49 6	51 6	54 0
Do	2	46 0	48 0	50 6
Argentine	1	27 6	30 6	32 6
Veal:
British	------	67 6	68 6	69 0
Foreign	------	68 0	68 0	68 6

Provisions.—The average price of all classes of butter was substantially higher in 1908 than in 1907. Irish creamery butter rose from 111s. 6d. a hundredweight in 1906 to 116s. in 1908, Danish butter from 118s. 6d. in 1906 to 121s. 6d. in 1908, Canadian from 110s. 6d. to 116s., New Zealand from 111s. to 118s., and Argentina from 107s. 6d. to 117s. There was a slight fall in the price of cheese, and a slight increase in the price of eggs.

Vegetables.—Potatoes which were 69s. 6d. a ton in March, 1906, were 90s. a ton in March, 1908. In regard to other vegetables and fruit, the returns only compare the years 1907 and 1908, but the increases for the twelve months are notable, as will be seen from the following table:

	1907.	1908.
	s. d.	s. d.
Peas, per hundredweight	9 0	12 6
Celery, per bundle	1 1	1 3
Lettuce, per dozen	9	10
Beets, per hundredweight	3 2	3 7
Carrots, per hundredweight	2 6	2 7
Black currants, per hundredweight	33 6	37 0
Damsons, per hundredweight	10 0	12 0
Gooseberries, per hundredweight	11 6	18 6
Grapes, per pound	1 2	1 4
Greengages, per hundredweight	26 0	27 6
Plums, per hundredweight	13 0	13 6
Strawberries, per pound	3½	4½

Prices are lower in the cases of asparagus, mushrooms, vegetable marrows, and parsnips.

Report of Consul-General Griffiths on costs of living in Great Britain (United States Consular Reports, Nov. 3, 1909):

"These prices are to be found in a report issued by the British Board of Agriculture, and a comparison in the report is instituted between the prices for the years, 1906, 1907, and 1908. The prices for 1909 would not be lower than those given for 1908.

"An examination of the report discloses that, with the exception of mutton and pork, the prices of meat were higher in 1908 than in 1907. It will be noticed that butter was very much dearer in 1908 than in 1907, and that bread was appreciably higher. With the exception of apples and pears, almost all fruits were dearer in 1908 than in 1907, while vegetables, with the exception of onions and home-grown peas, were generally cheaper.

"The following examples of prices cover pretty generally the cost of the principal necessaries and some of the luxuries which constitute the staple of living among the well-to-do classes in Great Britain. Whenever the term hundredweight is referred to in the following table it is the English hundredweight of 112 pounds, and whenever the ton is referred to it is the English ton of 2,240 pounds.

Report of Special Agent Clark on prices in Bradford, England (United States Consular Reports, Oct. 21, 1909):

"Food is higher in Scotland than in England, but is higher in Yorkshire than in Lancashire. For instance, at Dundee a 4-pound loaf of bread costs 6 pence (12 cents), but at Bradford it is only 5 pence, and at Manchester it is only 4½ pence. This proportion does not hold good in regard to all articles, but shows the general trend of the food costs. Of the Yorkshire wool towns Huddersfield is the highest. Bradford prices are about the average for the wool section.

"In Yorkshire, as throughout the United Kingdom, flour, potatoes, etc., are sold by the half-stone of 7 pounds, while bread is sold by the 4-pound loaf. Present prices (Oct. 21) at Bradford run about as follows in United States currency:

Articles.		Cents.
Tea	per pound	40.0
Sugar, granulated	do	4.3
Flour	do	2.3
Potatoes	do	.8
Bread	do	2.5
Butter	do	24.3
Cheddar cheese, American	do	13.5

Bacon, roll	do	16.0
Mutton, leg	do	19.0
Pork, leg	do	17.0
Eggs	per dozen	26.0
Milk	per quart	6.0

"Paraffin oil sells for 15 cents a gallon and coal sells by the hundredweight of 112 pounds for 22 cents.

"Many of the operatives belong to cooperative societies, and these get their groceries and coal cheaper than the above by about 15 per cent. The largest of these cooperative societies in Bradford has a membership of over 20,000."

Report of Special Agent Clark on prices in Nottingham and Calais (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

Articles.	Calais.	Nottingham.

"It is seen that in most instances the Nottingham operative has the advantage of cheaper food, and with his smaller wages the Calais operative is compelled to offset this by eating less of meat and more of vegetables. Beef, etc., is sold in France by the kilo and in England by the pound. Bread is sold in England by the 4-pound loaf, and at Nottingham a loaf costs 4½d. to 5½d., with average about 5d. (10 cents). In Dundee, where food costs higher than in any other industrial town in Great Britain, similar loaves cost 6d. (12 cents). Potatoes, flour, etc., are sold in Nottingham by the half-stone of 7 pounds. The French operative pays the high price of 4 francs a kilo (35 cents a pound) for coffee, and the English operative pays 36 cents a pound for tea. The kerosene oil used at Calais costs 30 centimes a liter (5.8 cents a quart), while the paraffin oil largely used at Nottingham costs 16 cents a quart. Coal is cheaper in Nottingham than in most parts of England, selling by the hundredweight at 8½d. to 10d. (17 to 20 cents), while in Calais the retail price is over twice as high."

Report of United States Consul Mahin on prices of bread in Nottingham (United States Consular Reports, May 7, 1909):

"A report from Consul Frank W. Mahin states that by an agreement among the Nottingham bakers the price of bread to the consumer in that English locality was advanced on March 15 1 cent per 4-pound loaf, with the minimum price 11 cents for the poorest grade and 13 cents for the best. The consul continues:

"Bread is usually sold in 2-pound loaves, the price being half that fixed for 4-pound loaves. The advance in price is actually more than a cent a loaf on the cheapest grades, which have been selling at 8 to 10 cents per 4 pounds. Prices have already been advanced or are being advanced throughout the country generally in a similar ratio.

"The local bakers having had no effective organization or understanding, discussion at recent meetings disclosed a bad state of affairs for them. The price of flour has been steadily rising, but the industrial depression has not only deterred bakers from advancing their prices, but has led them to cut prices and sell without profit in order to do business. Some have been driven into bankrutpcy, and the whole trade has been in a distressed condition for a year past. Millers have shared in the distress, having been unable to raise their prices equal to the advance in wheat, and having had serious losses from bad debts.

"Flour has advanced in this locality $1 to $1.25 a sack of 280 pounds since January, but the price rise of wheat has been proportionately greater, the millers claim.

"The whole situation indicates that the price of bread may be still further advanced during this year. The present increase only partially reflects the rise in wheat and flour."

Report of United States Consul Halstead on prices of bacon and ham in Birmingham (United States Consular Reports, Jan. 10, 1910):

"In view of the high price of bacon in England, due to a shortage in hogs, inquiry of the leading grocer in Birmingham as to the present (December 9, 1909) prices as compared with those at the same time in 1908, gives the following results. The prices in both years were per hundredweight (112 pounds), but they have been reduced to prices per pound for the better understanding of the conditions: Best English home-cured drafts (bellies), 18½ cents per pound, against 14½ cents in 1908; Wiltshire sides, which include backs, hams, and shoulders, 18.2 cents per pound, against 15 cents in 1908; Irish sides, 17.3 cents per pound, against 14.1 cents in 1908; American drafts (bellies), 17.1 cents per pound, against 13.9 cents in 1908; Canadian smoked sides, 16.3 cents per pound, against 13.5 cents in 1908."

France.

Statement of Paul Leroy Beaulieu (United States Consular Reports, April, 1908):

"M. Paul Leroy Beaulieu publishes in the Economiste Français some statistics showing to what extent prices have risen in France during the five years ending with 1907, the increase in each case being so much per cent, as follows: Bread rose 15 per cent, beef 22, veal 14, mutton 25, pork 27, condiments 25, pastry 25, petroleum 10, essence 30, butter 14, cheese 25, fresh fish 50, tinned fish 35, fresh vegetables 15, dry vegetables 30, coal 34, firewood 24, coffee 25, chocolate 25, candles 10, household utensils 25."

Germany.

Statement of Consul G. N. Ifft as to prices in Germany (United States Consular Reports, Nov. 20, 1908):

"From all parts of Germany sharp advances in the prices of the necessities of life, especially in foodstuffs and fodder for live stock, are reported. The latter have been noticeable during the past few weeks and are due, in a measure at least, to the unsatisfactory crops of the past year. The result is a strong upward movement in the prices of all foodstuffs. Meat is the only exception. It shows a slight tendency to lower prices, but is still above the figures of two years ago, and the slightly lower prices of to-day are, perhaps, due to the constant agitations for cheaper meat, which have continued uninterruptedly for two years past. In some instances municipalities have gone into the butchering business and have sold directly to the people, while in many places meat prices have been fixed by municipal enactment. Prices of milk, butter, and other dairy products have advanced in sympathy with the price of fodder, and the Imperial Bureau of Statistics notes, as well, advances in prices of tea, herring, vegetable oils, petroleum, tobacco, cotton goods, linen goods, woolens, etc. In fact, from this latter authority only two items, sugar and potatoes, are quoted as being cheaper to-day than they were a year ago.

"During a recent debate in the Saxon Landtag, figures furnished by the statistical bureau of the city of Dresden were quoted comparing the average retail prices of the principal foodstuffs for the years 1903 and 1906. They showed that during that time foodstuffs had advanced as follows, per kilogram (2.2046 pounds): Beef, 4 cents; pork, 6.2 cents; mutton, 5.5 cents; veal, 5.7 cents; bacon (speck), 4.9 cents; lard, 3.6 cents; bread, 0.6 cent; beans, 1.7 cents; lentils, 4.9 cents; coffee, 5.2 cents; butter, 2.6 cents; eggs, 2.9 cents per dozen. From these figures it was estimated that the cost of living for the average workingman's family of four to seven persons had for 1906, as compared with 1903, increased about $11.19, and that of this increase $4.05 was on account of the higher price of meat. During the same debate in the Landtag, figures compiled from reports from sixty cities and towns in Saxony were quoted, showing increases in rent (for dwellings renting for from $71.40 to $238 per year) of from 10 to 13 per cent. Coal prices from the cities of Leipzig, Dresden, and Chemnitz, the principal cities of Saxony, showed increases of from 10 to 20 per cent, according to the kind of grade of coal."

Statement of United States Consul C. B. Hurst as to prices in Germany (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

"The rise all over Germany in the cost of living has attracted considerable attention during the past two or three years. The prices of meat went to a figure never reached before, and although there has been a slight decline they will probably never descend to their former level."

Statement of Special Agent Clark as to food in Saxony:

"Food is of necessity quite simple. One person thoroughly acquainted with the life and conditions of operatives here says that the principal nourishment of the weavers consists of potatoes and salt, bread, and a so-called 'pepper soup,' made of water, bread, a little fat, and plenty of pepper. Meat is seldom eaten, and when indulged in at all is usually in a form of soup meat or sausage. Operatives generally eat five times a day, and rye bread is nearly always taken. The first breakfast consists of coffee, made chiefly of roasted grain, and a piece of bread or roll. Sometimes a bowl of hot water, with a little flour stirred in, is taken instead of coffee. The dinner is at midday. The morning, afternoon, and evening meals are much lighter, and in them beer often occupies a place."

Statement of Vice-Consul J. Laburrell as to prices in Madgeburg, Germany (United States Consular Reports, Apr. 1, 1909):

"The following statements show the maximum prices per pound of the different meats, according to cuts, on April 1, 1909, as compared with the prices which ruled on April 1, 1908:

"Beef, bullock.—Fillet, roast, leg, rib, and belly, 31, 24, 21, 20, and 17 cents, respectively; an increase of 3 cents on roast and 1 cent on rib, the other cuts remaining the same as in 1908.

"Veal.—Leg and cutlet, back, breast, and soup meat, 29, 26, 20, and 21 cents, respectively; an increase of 2 cents on breast; no change in the other cuts.

"Pork.—Fresh ham, cutlets, and neck pieces, 21 cents; an increase of 3 cents in ham and 2 cents in neck pieces.

"Mutton.—Leg, back, and cutlets, 21 cents; soup meat and belly pieces, 19 and 14 cents; no change from 1908.

"Bacon.—Fresh, 18 cents; smoked, 21 cents; an increase in both of 2 cents.

"Lard.—21 cents; an increase of 2 cents."

Austria.

Statement of United States Consul J. I. Brittain as to prices in Austria (United States Consular Reports, Nov. 19, 1909):

"Since 1907 the following articles have advanced in price as indicated by percentage, and for the better qualities even greater advances have been made: Lard 17, butter 20, flour 50, potatoes 25, buttermilk 10, bread 40, meal 60, sugar 20, veal 12, pork 10. In October the coffee houses in Prague made a further advance in prices, averaging 10 per cent. Prices of fuel have also advanced, in fact almost every article entering into household expenses has advanced in price."

Statement of United States consul as to cost of living in Reichenberg (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

"The employees live very plainly. Bread, potatoes, coffee, and beer is the standard diet. Meat is high, and only indulged in sparingly on Sundays. The operatives usually have 5 snacks a day, and at Reichenberg the daily cost was figured as follows: Morning meal at 6—coffee, 10 hellers (2.03 cents), bread, 6 hellers (1.2 cents); lunch at 9—bread and butter, 16 hellers (3.25 cents), dinner at noon—fried sausage and potatoes, 20 hellers (4.1 cents), beer, 9 hellers (1.8 cents); afternoon lunch at 4—bread and butter, 16 hellers (3.25 cents); supper at 7—bread, potatoes, and coffee or buttermilk, 25 hellers (5.07 cents); total, 102 hellers (20.7 cents)."

General statement as to mode of living in Switzerland (United States Consular Reports, 1909):

"As to the style of living, the better times of recent years have enabled the working people here to buy more meat and vegetables than formerly. To many meat was a rare luxury and potatoes and bread their principal nutrition. Potatoes are still the main food, and many operatives have leased small potato patches in the neighborhood of Eibenstock from farmers, who turn the patch over to them when the potatoes are ready for digging."

Sweden.

Report of United States consul as to prices in Sweden:

"Since most forms of food cost more in Sweden than in the United States, particularly the high-class breadstuffs and meats, it follows that at the low wages prevailing the standard of living is comparatively low. Coarse ground rye and graham are principally used for bread. Bacon is largely used, but meat is not usually served more than once a day on the workingman's table. Clothing costs less than in the United States; particularly is this noticeable in the better class of men's clothing, but goods consisting largely of cotton or rough goods of the cheaper variety usually worn about shops and factories cost only slightly less than in America."

Canada.

Report of United States Consul H. P. Dill as to prices in Toronto and Buffalo (United States Consular Reports, Sept. 13, 1909):

"A Toronto newspaper has investigated the prevailing retail prices in Buffalo and Toronto, and shows that prices generally are lower in the United States than in Canada. These two cities were selected because of their relative equality in population, location, transportation, and general development. The summing up seems to favor the American city in about every case:

"Ready-made clothing is about the same in price in both cities, though boys' suits at $2.75, overcoat with fur collar at same price, an exceedingly good-looking suit for a man at $9.75, and goods which appeared of equal quality, have never been seen in Toronto. In the very cheap lines of things used by men the difference is distinctly in favor of Buffalo. Umbrellas at 42 cents would bring in Toronto 60 cents. Cotton shirts at 42 cents are 50 cents here. In footwear the Buffalo people have the advantage. Ladies' and men's boots displayed at several Buffalo stores at $2.50 are sold 'every day' in Toronto for $3.50.

"In crockery, Buffalo prices are much lower. Vegetable dishes, retailing at 20 cents in Toronto, are to be had for 10 cents in Buffalo. Three-piece toilet sets selling at 52 cents would be quick sellers in Toronto for $1. Very many smaller articles were selling at 5 cents each, but the prices could not be duplicated in Toronto. Granite ware and such has a shade margin in favor of Buffalo on most articles, but on some the difference is fully as great as on crockery. Crumb trays at 10 cents are 25 cents in Toronto.

"A gas range selling in Canada for $25 can be bought for $21. A No. 9 cooking stove, with hot-water tank attachment, sells for $35; this is fully $7 lower than in Canada. In all goods in this line Buffalo has the advantage by just about the amount of the Canadian duty, or 25 per cent.

"In tea and coffee, as far as can be judged, the Toronto price is a shade below. In this connection it might be well to say that it is very difficult to find as good coffee in Canada as in the United States. Canada has relatively more tea-drinking people than the United States, and grocers generally carry a larger variety of tea than do American dealers. There is no doubt that as good tea can be found in the United States as in Canada; but, on the other hand, a first-class coffee is a scarce article in Canada.

"Taking into account all the lines covered, the cost of household necessities is considerably higher in Toronto than in Buffalo."

Belgium.

Statement of United States Consul-General Watts as to prices of meat in Belgium (United States Consular Reports, July 14, 1908):

"Statistics show that the importation of horses (as meat) is increasing annually, the importations in 1904 having been 20,218 head; in 1905, 22,284 head; and in 1906, 26,294 head, the greater part of which was from England.

"There are two recognized abattoirs for Brussels and suburbs, namely, the Anderlecht-Cureghem slaughterhouse (a private corporation) and the city of Brussels slaughterhouse (municipal). The former butchers 2,798 to 2,950 and the latter about 1,200 to 1,500 horses annually. This large consumption of horse meat is due to the high charges for other meats in this city.

"There are about 36 butchers' establishments in Brussels and suburbs retailing horse meat only. The retail price varies from 35 centimes (6.7 cents) to 80 centimes (15.4 cents) per one-half kilo (1.1 pounds).

"The following are the present retail prices of beef per one-half kilo: Best tenderloin (filet pur), 3 francs (57.9 cents); other good beef for roasting, 1.45 to 1.6 francs (27.9 to 30.8 cents); soup and inferior beef, 60 to 90 centimes (11.5 to 17.4 cents); mutton, 80 centimes to 1.25 francs (15.4 to 24.1 cents); veal, 1.25 to 1.6 francs (24.1 to 30.9 cents); pork about the same price as mutton."

Japan.

Statement of United States Consul at Kobe in regard to prices in Japan (United States Consular Reports, Oct. 6, 1909):

"From the columns of Asaka Asahi translation is made, showing the range of prices of leading commodities during August and September of this year, compared with January, 1902. Taking 100 as a basis at the later date, it will be observed that there has been a market in nearly all lines. The articles which show greatest increases in prices are leather, 183; seaweed, 160; wheat, 153. timber, 149; raw cotton, 144; vegetable wax, 143; matting, 142; charcoal, 141; mousselines, 138; eggs, 136; firewood, 135. The greatest decreases appear in sheet glass, 65, and imported iron, 83. The prices of porcelain, 101, zinc sheet, 98; rape-seed oil, 98, and French nails, 97, show little change."

Prices paid in Boston and abroad by Massachusetts training ship Enterprise, summer of 1908.

Mr. LODGE. I desire, in conclusion, to lay before the Senate the statement of Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in regard to wages and prices in England and Europe, which is of the highest interest in connection with the question I have been discussing.

Report of President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor.

[American Federationist, January, 1910.]

WAGES AND COST OF LIVING.

"Where are wages best?" workingmen ask me. "Other points in favor of America don't count for much if a man's earnings here can't bring him a better living than in European countries. Is it true that a mark in Germany or a franc in France will go as far as a dollar in the United States?"

In reply, some examples of wages in Europe may be given and then some description of the circumstances in the European workmen's situation as I took note of them. Precisely what the differences are in the cost of living in the different countries is a question involving many factors over which sociological investigators and tariff wranglers have long disputed. What I can give is the result of visiting workmen in their homes in various cities, hearing the statements of labor representatives and others as to prices and wages, and completing this sort of information with comparisons of wage scales and trade-union reports given me in the countries I visited.

IN GREAT BRITAIN.

In the debates and conferences at the British Trade Union Congress, at Ipswich, in September, the national trade-union secretaries and other prominent delegates could hardly be expected to err greatly when referring to earnings in their own occupations. Some of their statements are herewith given. Richard Bell, M. P., of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, speaking of the necessity for railway men in the Ipswich district to come into the unions, said that while working at 17 shillings ($4.25) a week they had refused to assist the union in getting them an advance of 2 shillings. It is to be kept in mind that the English shilling is really 24 American cents, though usually computed at 25. G. H. Roberts, M. P., averred that in some parts of East Anglia, the eastern central part of England, agricultural laborers are being paid 12 shillings a week. Will Thorne, M. P., mentioned that builders' laborers in Ipswich were receiving 4½ pence (9 cents) an hour. Men in the audience called out: "Quite right, and 3½ pence, sir." A. G. Smith, of the London cab drivers, said public motor-car men received 25 per cent on every pound they took in, but as they had to pay for their gasoline, which was often wasted, it frequently happened that all they had for themselves after a fifteen-hour day was 2 shillings. R. Davies, of the municipal employees, arguing for a recognized minimum in all industries, quoted the Ipswich trade-union minimum for builders' laborers as 5 pence per hour. A resolution was adopted advocating minimum wages of 30 shillings for a 48-hour week for government workers in the London district and 36 shillings in the danger buildings of the explosives factory in the arsenal at Woolwich. These two demands, it is to be observed, which mark an objective point above what is paid, reach only $7.50 and $9 a week.

In London the present weekly union scale for men in the binding department in printing offices is 34 shillings for fifty-four hours, and for cutters 30 shillings, and girl folders 15. In the private shipyards doing naval work—those in the Tyne, Clyde, Mersey, Thames, and Barrow districts—the wages run on the average: Platers, 38s. 3d.; riveters and calkers, 24s. 9d.; holders up, 28s. 3d. Government dockyards maximum pay is: Platers, 28 shillings; riveters and calkers, 28 shillings, holders up, 25 shillings. The entire range here is $6 to less than $9.50.

The long hours worked in some occupations was called to the attention of the Congress. It was said by Alderman J. Hayhurst, J. P., of the bleachers' union, to be a common thing for men in the bleaching, dyeing, and calico-printing industries to work twelve and fourteen hours a day. Councilor G. T. Jackson, J. P., of the tramway employees' union, introduced a resolution calling for an eight-hour lapse between the end of one day's work and the beginning of the next, and providing that any one day should not be spread over more than twelve hours. He told of an accident occurring at 11 p. m. through the exhaustion of a man who had begun work at 6 a. m. E. Spice, of the London watermen, wanted twelve hours as a maximum day for the lads under 18 working at lighterage on the Thames. A delegate of the tailors stated that women employed by a fashionable Regent street firm worked eighty-four hours a week for 3 pence an hour.

In the foregoing figures we have for England examples not only of the highest wages paid in some of the best organized trades, but also of the rates current in those poorly organized. In other words, the range covers the varying scales for all wage-workers' occupations. Further quotations would carry but the repetition of what is a general fact. Earnings in England, however, can not be based on weekly wage scales; unemployment, varying as to the individuals involved, is now so bad as to be spoken of as a settled national feature in industry. The inspector-general of the army was quoted at Ipswich as mentioning in his last annual report that 90 out of every 100 men enlisting in the army had given unemployment as their reason for becoming soldiers.

IN GERMANY.

A general survey of wages in Germany is to be had in the tables giving the average yearly earnings as reported under the workingmen's insurance laws. The Correspondenzblatt of the Trade Union General Commission for Germany, April 18, 1908, page 55, has one of these tables. Only three or four of the trades average over 1,200 marks ($300), at which sum, according to the law, begins the excess reckoned at one-third the actual amount. Most of the averages run less than 1,000 marks ($250). These general insurance statistics of wages may be verified by union scales. For instance, the Berlin saddlers' organization calls for 27 or 28 marks a week; the Hamburg shipbuilders, 34 to 50 marks; the Berlin plumbers, 60 to 70 pfennigs an hour for a nine-hour day, being $8 to $9 a week. These are among the highest wages. The lowest are for day laborers, which rarely go above 3 marks a day and sometimes below 2½ in a list compiled by the local authorities in three cities in accordance with the insurance laws.

IN AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In Austria and Hungary wages run, as seen by the American eye, accustomed to dollars, at about equal levels for the two countries, high in big cities and low in agricultural districts. The industry of Hungary is flour milling. Budapest millers boasted to me that their mills were better than those of Minneapolis. A few years ago, before the workmen were organized, mill wages varied, one giving but 50 cents a day for work that in other mills brought 80. The pay for skilled millers, while more nearly uniform, averages now less than the latter figure. In Budapest, bricklayers, among the best-paid workmen in the building trades, get $1 to $1.20 a day. In the winter they find unskilled work at 60 cents. First-class carpenter joiners earn $1.30 to $1.90. Budapest has a thousand female cigar makers, working in the government factories, at 30 to 40 cents a day. Miners in north Hungary sometimes attain to the level of 60 cents.

IN ITALY.

The wages in Italy reach their highest point in Milan, the great modern commercial and industrial city of the Kingdom. In 1907 the following were some of the demands of the unions: The painters and paper hangers, a minimum of 60 cents, 80 cents, and $1 a day (American money), eight and a half hours in the winter and ten the rest of the year; stationary firemen, 9 cents an hour; gold-leaf workers, $1.20; assistants, 75 cents, nine hours; bookbinders, 10 per cent advance for the men making 80 cents a day, 15 per cent for hands making 50 cents to 80, 22 per cent for those making 30 to 50; masons and assistants in the building trades, minimum per hour, 9 cents; apprentices, 7⅞; laborers, 6; boys, 4; lithographers, graded, $8.40, $7.80, $7; street cleaners, graded, 78, 72, 67, 60, and 45 cents a day.

The trade unions are much stronger in Milan than elsewhere in Italy. Wages taper off southward, the unions also diminishing in number and importance. The building trades in the south have wages only 60 to 70 per cent of those paid in Milan, as recorded at the union national headquarters.

CHEAP POLICEMEN.

Quotations from my notes on union wage scales for the smaller countries, such as Belgium, Switzerland, and Bohemia (the latter having its own national labor movement), would give slight variations of wages, somewhat between the Italian and English or German levels. As I have said, the American mind, accustomed to make estimates in dollars, can not easily appreciate differences that to the European workman may appear considerable. To be told that the policemen in London get $6 to $9 a week; in Paris, $6 to $8; in Vienna or Rome, $5 to $7, leaves the man who has acquaintances on the New York force at $20 and $30 only under the impression that all European policemen are cheap, an impression deepened after he has tipped a London policeman 6 pence for hunting a cab for him ten minutes, or a Vienna policeman 5 cents for giving information as to his baggage at a railway station.

AMERICAN WORKING PEOPLE TRAVELING IN EUROPE.

In Europe it is a matter of great astonishment that our women school-teachers can afford to make "the grand tour" on their own savings. Scores, perhaps hundreds, to-day of our bright instructresses make the two ocean voyages for $100 and travel to London, Paris, the Rhine, perhaps Berlin and Rome, for six or seven or even ten weeks, for $250 more. The young European mechanic or laborer, home again after two or three years in America, smartly clothed and flush in spending money, perhaps back to be married, is a common subject for neighborhood gossip in Europe, whether it relates to the printer in Liverpool, the miner in Westphalia, the cigar maker in Prague, or the "excavator" in Naples. Such facts, elusive to the census maker, tell a story of their own.

PRINTERS' WAGES COMPARED.

The printing trade, in all countries at the highest point in union organization, affords a basis for wage comparisons. In New York the union weekly scale for compositors on morning newspapers is $31; on book work $21.50. In London, the book scale is 39 shillings (less than $9.50); in Paris, the minimum, $9; in Milan, $7 (5.20 lire per day); in Austria the towns and cities are divided into six classes for compositors' weekly wages, running respectively $4.40, $4.80, $5.20, $5.60, $5.80, and $6.20; in Budapest the minimum scale is $4.80. The custom of paying the best hands more than the minimum scale is more prevalent in European countries than in America. The briefest mention of the printing business, with comparison of wages, requires notice of the fact that machinery, and that of the first order, in the press and composing rooms is in more common use in America than in any European country. I was shown through a model book and job printing office in London that had no composing machines, and the Cologne Zeitung, the great daily newspaper of Rhenish Germany, has none. Seldom are any seen in the many cooperative establishments. They are rare in the offices of Austria, Hungary, and Italy. I am reliably informed that more type is set in one daily newspaper office in a week in New York than in all the printing offices of Naples. That fact is in agreement with the rule that with high wages in America there is often a low cost of production, coming from the education and energy of the workers, perfected machinery, and organization on a large scale. My facts indicate that money wages in America in many trades are double those paid abroad.

But, the cost of living?

VARIATION IN STANDARDS OF LIVING.

Two classes of writers and talkers may be found who assert that "one may live in Europe on half what it costs in America." The first of these classes is the employers of Europe as a body; they are interested in keeping their workmen with them, to compete with one another, besides being actuated by anti-American sentiment that calls for no more than mention here. The other class is mostly made up of well-to-do American sojourners abroad. The latter undoubtedly find several items in their own outlay less than in America, among them being personal service, objects of luxury, and their house rents. As relating to themselves and their social classes, their assertions are correct, especially as regards city life. The European working classes, however, neither hire servants nor buy articles of luxury except in rare cases. The struggle for a barely decent living is ever before them. Their necessary annual family "budget" comprises plain and cheap food, which, on the average, takes 40 to 65 per cent of the entire outlay, quarters in either an "industrial" or "slum" district, requiring 20 to 35 per cent, and clothing 10 per cent or more. These percentages must be indefinite, depending as they do upon the size of the family, on earnings, and on climate, and even the government. Mentally contemplating the many cities I visited, and having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely on the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay in money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior supply of the good things of life in America.

If I am called on to name one of the good things which is conspicuous, I reply: "Our common schools for the workers' children," and as I write the words I hear again the enthusiastic sentiments on this point uttered in my presence by Italians, Bohemians, Austrians, and Irishmen. "To think," they say, "your country gives even the schoolbooks free!"

A LIST OF NECESSARIES CHEAP IN AMERICA.

Living is cheap to the wage-worker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow-workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desires for equality with his American neighbors, and in general a larger and freer life.

"How often do these people eat meat?" is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking about among wage-workers. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States. Naples and vicinity is often spoken of as offering plentiful and cheap living. Within the customs-bonded district of the port of Naples are large cold-storage warehouses, whence meat is furnished to vessels in the American and Mediterranean service. It is American meat. If it could be carted just 100 yards from the warehouse through the gates of the great iron customs department fence into Naples, this meat could be sold at from 25 to 50 per cent below local prices. The warehouse owners stand ready to do business with all Italy, furnishing a better grade of meat at greatly reduced prices, if the tariff barrier were removed. This is but a single illustration of a general fact. Staple American agricultural products—wheat, fruits, cheese—in many parts of Europe are sold at lower than the local prices or as low. The immigrant, coming to America, finds that, if he can buy in quantity, and (in cases where he need not) his flour, fuel, potatoes, oil, sugar, coffee, salt—the essentials for his plain table—all cost less than they ordinarily do in the land he left. The cheapness and abundance of many varieties of fruits and of our melons and tomatoes is a surprise to him. Closely after the most pressing necessities comes a line of things cheaper than in Europe—cotton clothing, including overalls, jumpers, shoes (the American shoe has a sale all over the Continent); newspapers, the cent buying twice to four times the reading matter contained in a German, French, or Italian paper. Access to good water renders expenditure for alcoholic drinks less common. The cheapness of good amusements in America deserves more attention than has been given the subject by the professional investigator; it is a social factor having an enormous influence on the tastes and education of the working class public. The possibility of regarding outlay for amusements as one of the regular items in family expenses is an indication of the working class standard of living.

POVERTY IN GREAT BRITAIN.

How the wage-earners and their families attire themselves is not so much a question of the cheapness of clothing as it is of what is left over for this purpose after food, shelter, and other unavoidable family needs have been provided for. The features of climate, national customs, and class standards must also be considered. In southern countries, where the same clothes are worn the year around, people may appear well in public at half the expense required in America, in the North, where there are four seasons. In the United Kingdom the poor dress in much the same clothing summer and winter, the large proportion of the people in shabby clothes in the streets of Dublin, Manchester, or London giving an impression to the American observer of a prevalent poverty.

The masses make a better appearance in Paris and Berlin. In Italy a young fellow may be a dandy in a straw hat and cotton duck suit. Fine wool and silk stuffs, furs, laces, and kid gloves cost less abroad than in the United States—a fact, however, which bears as lightly in an inquiry into the conditions of the masses as does the tariff on the masterpieces of art.

HOUSING.

The housing of the wage-workers of the various European countries as compared with that of the same class in America would, in order to bring out the full truth, require a long and faithful study. When the facts were ascertained, the real point remaining would be how to present them in order to create an exact impression of the truth. Besides, in making comparisons, a difficulty would be in fixing an American standard. Conditions exist in a few American cities, such as New York, Pittsburg, and Chicago, representing neither European nor American standards, but what are created through the transition of the most helpless of our newly arrived immigrants from a state perhaps more miserable than that in which they lived in their native countries to a level equal to the financially lowest that is permanent among the American-born citizens. Looking at the housing problem widely, the greatest fact in favor of America is space. The workingman in the country towns and in the cities smaller than those in which the foreign population is congested can rent or perhaps buy a separate home. In general, Europe does not give this opportunity. For example, Bremen is the only considerable city in Germany which has small single-family houses adapted to the needs of working people. Only the big tenement house, except in rare cases, is to be found in other cities. The wage-earner in them is regarded as permanently a rent payer, an animal in a stall in a five, six, or seven story stable. No, not one animal in one stall; not so good as that—whole families or a herd of lodgers live in one of the stalls. The doubling up of families of relatives, the keeping of lodgers, the hiring of a small apartment by several young persons, such devices for distributing among many persons the burdens of rent must be general in cities where apartments are made the landlord's investment and few small homes are built to sell the man with a small purse. The barracks-like houses of the German cities are planned so as to accommodate people in comparatively easy circumstances in the desirable apartments of the front, up to the fourth story, while the basement and the small rear and the topmost apartments go to the swarm of folks living on low wages. Berlin has been called "the city that wears a dickey," since its imposing streets of big dwelling houses have the best apartments on view to the front, behind which exist shabbiness and the general unattractiveness of things unseen. In the northern district of Berlin is the new "workingmen's quarter," with broad streets, window-garden houses, and evidences of municipal care as to hygiene, one result being that rents, compared with wages, run close to the high American level.

RENTS.

In no city in Europe did I find rents any cheaper, wages considered, than they run in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Louisville, or in the New England towns not having a boom, or even in many cities of the Mississippi basin. What strikes the American is how little the European renting wage-worker gets for his money. Very seldom indeed has he a bit of garden; he takes a poor water service for granted; his rooms are fewer and smaller than is ordinarily the case in an American house. The rent payer is usually a rent payer for life. No institution of the proportion of the American building and loan association exists in any European country. The movement of large masses from the position of rent payers to that of householders has been characteristic of America. European philanthropists, statesmen, and cooperators are at the present time endeavoring to establish the necessary methods to bring about the same results.

CONCLUSIONS.

Space here, to my regret, is insufficient to permit me to quote the rentals paid by wage-workers in various European cities which are entered in my notes. I have been obliged to give my conclusions on the subject in general terms. The main conclusion as to housing is the same as that relating to food: If the immigrant to this country is willing to continue living here at the same level he was obliged to accept in his native land, he can find it for the same money.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into any elaborate discussion of the very intricate questions discussed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I desire, however, to call attention to some specific facts which may a little further elucidate the question he has been discussing.

My proposition, Mr. President, is that the present high prices of articles necessary for the maintenance of life, while a great many different causes may be suggested, are due in the main to the general tariff system of this country; that in the high level of prices of articles sought to be protected by the protective tariff necessarily there must be a corresponding rise in the prices of other articles which may not be so particularly and directly the subject of the protective tariff.

In the second place, I think the specific imposition of protective duties on fresh meats, and so forth, has a very material influence, and it is to that particular phase of the question that I desire to address a very few remarks and to give some concrete illustrations.

Before coming to those, however, I desire to call attention to the fact that when the tariff bill was under discussion last year there was a distinct issue in the Senate as to whether or not there should be a high tariff on beef and other fresh meat, and upon that issue there was some discussion, and a vote was taken in the Senate. I call attention to the RECORD, where that vote is to be found, and in order that the significance of the vote may be particularly noted and appreciated I will read a little of what was said in the presentation of that particular issue.

The paragraph in the tariff bill which imposed a duty upon fresh beef, veal, mutton, pork, venison and other game, excepting birds, is numbered 281. The Senate will remember that when the tariff bill was under discussion, by general consent certain paragraphs were passed over for future consideration. When paragraph 281 was reached, at my request it was passed over—the one I have just read. Subsequently to that time, by some misunderstanding, that paragraph was acted upon and adopted. Not being able to reach it otherwise, I moved a reconsideration of the action of the Senate in the adoption of the paragraph, stating at the time that the object of the motion was to offer an amendment by which the rate of duty would be lowered not only below that proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, but below the rate proposed in the House bill.

The tariff on fresh meat under the Dingley bill was 2 cents a pound. The House bill which came to us last summer reduced it to a cent and a half a pound. The Finance Committee, in their report, after the consideration of the House bill, proposed to raise it to 2 cents a pound, and that is the rate fixed in paragraph 281, which I have referred to. That was the rate adopted by the Senate in the adoption of paragraph 281. I will remark in passing that subsequently the conference committee reduced it to 1½ cents a pound.

But at the time I speak of the question before the Senate was a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in agreeing to paragraph 281, with the purpose then announced of moving a rate of duty lower than that fixed in the House bill, and I will read a little from the RECORD to show that that was the specific issue upon which the vote was taken, and then I shall read the vote.

It is a matter of considerable importance and interest to the people of this country at the present time, when everybody is so nearly approaching the point of starvation, so far as meat is concerned, that it is filling the columns of the newspapers, and the people all over this land, rich people as well as poor people, are uniting in a concerted effort to do something to try to bring meat down to living prices—it is a matter of some interest to the people of the United States to have their attention called to the fact that this issue was made when the tariff bill was before the Senate, and that there was a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do for a question, but not for argument, because I want first to complete my statement.

Mr. WARREN. I do not desire to enter into any argument. But do I understand the Senator to say that the present duty on fresh meat is a half cent less than it was under the old law?

Mr. BACON. It is.

Mr. WARREN. Has that reduction in duty reduced the price of meat to the public?

Mr. BACON. I do not think it has.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask one further question. If taking off one-quarter of the tariff on meat has raised the price of meat, what would be the result if we should take off the entire duty?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, before I get through I will endeavor to answer that question. A statement as to the difference in the price of meat in this country, under our tariff, and the price of the same meat sold in other countries, I think, will answer the question.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have those figures, because I have them.

Mr. BACON. I have them also.

Mr. WARREN. As we are all more directly interested in the price we pay for meat in this country, I will be very glad if the Senator will show why taking off a quarter of the tariff on meat to our own people has not reduced the price. I hope he will enter into that quite fully.

Mr. BACON. Possibly if the quarter had not been taken off the price of meat would be still higher than it is.

Mr. WARREN. That is a good guess, but not a sufficient answer.

Mr. BACON. Very possibly; and if the illustration I shall give as to the price of meat in this country and in other countries is a correct illustration, it may be a little more than a probability—it may come somewhat into the domain almost of a certainty—that the price in this country would have been higher than it is now if the tariff had not been reduced that quarter.

But the Senator interrupted me at a time when I was trying to make a presentation of the direct issue before the Senate at the time the vote was taken. I not only want the direct issue correctly presented, but I want to present the vote. I desire to show how Senators voted on a question which has now become so important to the people of this country and which so concerns their welfare and their comfort and their health.

I will read a little of the RECORD, page 2602, May 31, 1909:

Mr. BACON. I move to reconsider the action of the Senate by which it agreed to the amendment proposed by the Senate committee changing the provision in the House bill from 1½ to 2 cents a pound on fresh beef, veal, mutton and lamb, pork, venison, and other game, except birds.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it be stated.

Mr. BACON. I move to reconsider the action of the Senate in agreeing to the amendment striking out the House provision, "1½," and inserting 2 cents in lieu thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment to paragraph 281 was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall vote against that proposition, and I shall do so with the idea that the committee will consider this question and see whether any modification should be made. I shall vote to agree to this paragraph as it stands—that is, with the committee amendment agreed to. I hope if there is any change to be made it will be after due notice and conference with the Senators interested.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not press his motion to-night, because I take it there will be some discussion on it.

Mr. BACON. I have no disposition to press for a vote to-night, but I must have a vote on it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that he do not make the motion now, but wait until the matter gets into the Senate, because that would save considerable time. He will lose no rights by doing so.

Mr. BACON. I do not know why I should do that. I deferred to the wish so far as the paragraph unamended went. I propose to offer an amendment to the House paragraph. In other words, I propose to reduce below the rate proposed by the House the duties on bacon and ham and on lard, but I do not make the motion now, because the Senator having withdrawn the Senate committee amendments, there is no amendment pending to those two paragraphs. But when it comes to paragraph 281 there is a distinct Senate amendment.

That is the paragraph with reference to beef and other fresh meats.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit a vote to be taken now on the question of reconsideration?

Mr. BACON. Yes. I am not going to add anything to what I have said. I have discussed this as fully as I wish. But I do desire to state that I propose, if the Senate reconsiders it, to offer an amendment still further reducing the rate than it is in the House bill, especially since the interchange between the Senator from Idaho and myself, which has thrown some light upon the effect of his paragraph upon the prices the people have to pay for fresh meat.

"This" it should be.

The interchange there alluded to between the Senator from Idaho and myself occurred on the same day, and is found in the same issue of the RECORD. It was upon a suggestion, or statement, made by the Senator that he had represented to the people of his State that those who made hay got $4 for it, more than they would get if there was not a duty of $4 a ton on hay, and that brought us to the proposition, which I suggested to the Senator from Idaho, and upon which we had some little interchange, in the course of which the Senator from Rhode Island took issue with the Senator from Idaho, upon the general proposition that the imposition of a duty to that extent increased the cost of the article to the domestic consumer. That was the interchange to which I alluded at that point. But the distinct proposition, as the Senate will now observe from what I have read, was that there should be a reconsideration of the action of the Senate in agreeing to paragraph 281, in order that an amendment might be offered which would put the rate of duty on beef and other fresh meats below the rate expressed in the House bill. That was the distinct issue, and upon that issue the yeas and nays were called. On the motion to reconsider, with the avowed and distinct purpose to put the rate of duty on fresh meats below 1½ cents—not only below the Senate rate, but below the House rate—and upon the distinct issue raised as to whether or not there should be a reconsideration for the purpose of affording an apportunity to vote upon that amendment, the vote was as I shall read it. Upon the motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in agreeing to paragraph 281, for the purpose of offering an amendment still further lowering the rate of duty on fresh meat, the vote was as follows:

YEAS—32.

Bacon	Clay	Gamble	Overman
Bailey	Culberson	Gore	Rayner
Bankhead	Cummins	Hughes	Shively
Beveridge	Daniel	Johnston, Ala.	Simmons
Bristow	Dolliver	Martin	Smith, Md.
Brown	Fletcher	Money	Smith, S. C.
Burton	Frazier	Nelson	Taliaferro
Clarke, Ark.	Gallinger	Newlands	Tillman

They were those who voted to give an opportunity to lower the rate of duty on fresh meat. The nays were as follows:

NAYS—40.

Aldrich	Clark, Wyo.	Elkins	Penrose
Borah	Crane	Flint	Perkins
Bradley	Crawford	Frye	Piles
Brandegee	Cullom	Hale	Root
Briggs	Curtis	Heyburn	Scott
Bulkeley	Depew	Johnson, N. Dak.	Smoot
Burkett	Dick	Kean	Stephenson
Burnham	Dillingham	Lodge	Warner
Burrows	Dixon	McEnery	Warren
Carter	du Pont	Page	Wetmore

Then follows a list of those not voting, and I will put into the RECORD in that connection, immediately following the last remark I have quoted from myself, the announcement of the pairs, so that the entire record will be complete.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. My colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is absent, unpaired. I transfer the pair with the Senator from Delaware to my colleague, to stand until further announcement, and I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] is paired with the Senator's colleague.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think that has been canceled. My information is that that pair has served its purpose, and is exhausted by the time limit.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. He is absent. I am advised that if he were present he would vote on this motion as I shall vote. I shall therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PILES. My colleague [Mr. JONES] was called from the Chamber a few moments ago and has not returned in time to vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair, as I stated, with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Bacon	Clay	Gamble	Overman
Bailey	Culberson	Gore	Rayner
Bankhead	Cummins	Hughes	Shively
Beveridge	Daniel	Johnston, Ala.	Simmons
Bristow	Dolliver	Martin	Smith, Md.

Clapp	La Follette	Owen	Sutherland
Davis	McCumber	Paynter	Taylor
Foster	McLaurin	Richardson

So the motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, that having been the vote taken, the question is whether that was a proposition which, if it had carried, would have brought any relief to the people of the United States in the present prices which they have to pay for fresh meat.

Mr. President, I do not contend that that is the only thing which influences these prices by any means, but I think it does influence them most directly and specifically, and the best evidence of it which I can give is to point to the difference in the prices of the same articles and to a great extent sold by the same parties in this country and in other countries where the rates of tariff are different.

In the course of that debate I read something that same day, taken from the Philadelphia Press, a standard Republican authority, which I had previously read in a speech made by me in the Senate upon the subject of the tariff some years before, which I reread and which I will again read to-day. The article which I then read and which I now read was an editorial in the Washington Post, in which there is a quotation from the Philadelphia Press. The article in the Philadelphia Press appeared, I want to say, as far back as 1902, but it illustrates the influence of the tariff upon the price of meat, in giving the difference between the price of meat in the United States and the price of meat immediately across the line in Canada, the two points specified in the article being immediately opposite, on different sides of the river which divides the two countries.

The article from the Washington Post, which, as everybody knows, is not a free-trade paper, or even a tariff-for-revenue paper, but a paper which is avowedly in favor of protection——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. For a question.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all. Does the Senator refer to the retail price in Canada and America?

Mr. BACON. Possibly if the Senator will let me read the article he will get the information. This is an editorial from the Washington Post, and there is a quotation in it from the Philadelphia Press. I will read the entire article as it was read in that debate, so far as it is quoted there. The Washington Post in its editorial said as follows:

About the last source to which one would naturally look for an argument in favor of the reduction of any tariff schedule is the Philadelphia Press. In harmony with the Republican sentiment of Pennsylvania, the Press opposes tariff revision. In their recently adopted platform the Pennsylvania Republicans declare their "unswerving loyalty"—

Those words being in quotation marks—to the Dingley tariff and set themselves squarely against any effort to revise it or to interfere in any way with its operations. They also—

This is quoted—

"affirm the friendship of the Republican party for the breadwinner and the home builder."

To all this the Press heartily subscribes, seemingly unconscious that its party is going into the congressional campaign under the management of an enthusiastic advocate of tariff revision, a revision that has for its central point the leading industry of Pennsylvania, which is protected by duties for which he declares there is no necessity and can be no defense.

But while the Press stands up bravely for the tariff as it is, although well knowing that some of its schedules were framed and adopted with a view to their cutting down almost immediately, the necessities of its position as a real newspaper compel it incidentally to condemn some of its provisions, and their condemnation is an inferential protest against other schedules that produce similar results. Just as the free-trade organs condemn their theory by printing the statistics of our industries, our commerce, our national finances, and savings-banks deposits, so the organs of extreme protection, or protection gone mad, furnish convincing arguments against their policy by printing facts. For example, just before the Republican congressional candidates go out on a campaign in which they will find it impossible either to dodge or defend the tariff on meat, the Press shows the difference in meat prices between Buffalo and Fort Erie, directly opposite in Canada.

This is the information which is given by the Philadelphia Press.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I wish to finish reading the editorial before I submit to an interruption.

Mr. WARREN. I merely want to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. I will give the Senator an opportunity. The article proceeds:

It says the beef trust has advanced the prices in Buffalo from 25 to 50 per cent. Porterhouse steak, for instance, is 24 cents in Buffalo and 16 cents in Fort Erie; loin steak, 15 cents in the city which is forced to pay beef-trust prices and 12 cents in Fort Erie. The Press says that the cost of living has been increased by the trust, so far as meat is concerned, from 10 to 50 per cent, as these figures prove.

It did not occur to our Philadelphia contemporary to mention any reason why the beef trust is able to run up prices on this side of the line while they remain in statu quo on the other side. But it is likely to occur to a good many millions of consumers, and especially to wage-workers, that the duty imposed on beef cattle and all kinds of dressed meat is what has caused important change in the contents of the "full dinner pail."

Now I will hear the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator lays great stress upon his authority and quotes it as the standard Republican authority. I suppose he means the standard authority on the price of meat.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator must not predicate his argument upon a false supposition.

Mr. WARREN. I am not going to make an argument.

Mr. BACON. No; but the Senator is predicating what he is about to say upon a misstatement.

Mr. WARREN. I am about to say, if the Senator will permit me, that he has read the expressions in a newspaper of some one man. I will ask the Senator whether he does not think that the market reports made from day to day, going back to that period and since and taking the market price of meats in those two towns, sold at retail and at wholesale, is not better authority than even the Philadelphia Press in an editorial by some man?

Mr. BACON. I will state as a fact that those were the prices.

Mr. LODGE. How does the Senator know it is a fact? Is there any official report of it?

Mr. BACON. I take that from the statement of the Philadelphia Press.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senator——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator asks a question, he certainly must permit me to answer it.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he had answered it.

Mr. BACON. If I had gotten through, it would have been an answer, but I had not finished it. I certainly want to give it.

Mr. LODGE. I will not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. BACON. The Senator may interrupt me as much as he wishes, but I wish to finish my answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to annoy the Senator. I see that I annoyed him, and I will not do it again.

Mr. BACON. The Senator need not be sensitive on the subject. He and I have been in the Senate fifteen years, and the Senator well knows that the time has never been when I was not ready to be interrupted by the Senator on any proposition he saw fit to discuss in the Senate. It has been true in the past and it is true now. The Senator need not put himself upon the elevated plane that these interruptions are embarrassing or that they are annoying.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to say that they were embarrassing. I said they were annoying to the Senator, and that is quite evident.

Mr. BACON. I am ready to be interrupted at any time the Senator desires on this or any other question. I think I can appeal to the RECORD that I have not been slow to recognize the right of Senators to interrupt me when I have had the honor to address the Senate, either the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask a question. I have some interest in the subject and the discussion of the tariff.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is reputed to have a good deal of interest in it.

Mr. WARREN. I have some knowledge of the market. I wish to say that the editorials that appear from time to time and loose remarks do not as a general thing receive the indorsement of those who know what the prices are. I wanted to see how much confidence the Senator placed upon an editorial, which is some one man's expression, without a single proof, alongside of market figures which show the direct opposite. For instance, in a case like that, would he take the Philadelphia Press in an editorial on the market report or the market reports of those two localities? I will say to the Senator that that report is not correct, based upon the market reports at that time.

Mr. BACON. At that time?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. In 1902?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator have the reports of that date of those two places?

Mr. WARREN. I will give the Senator the prices if he will give me the time.

Mr. BACON. Of course I want to get the facts if the Senator has them. But the proposition is this: Here is a prominent Republican newspaper, devoted to the cause of protection, which makes the statement—the Philadelphia Press undoubtedly made the statement—that at that time the difference in the price of meat in Buffalo and in Fort Erie was as stated and as I have read.

Mr. President, can it be supposed for a moment that such a statement as that could have been made with any purpose to misrepresent the truth by this prominent Republican newspaper, wedded to the cause of protection? Can it be supposed that the Philadelphia Press made that statement with any purpose to misstate the truth? Can it be supposed that such a radical statement as that could have been made if untrue and not receive contradiction from the press of the country?

Mr. President, that article was read by me in a debate in the Senate in 1904, in which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] took an active part. He is the great high priest and apostle of protection and the leader of this body on the subject of protection. There was no pretense then that it was a misstatement of facts, and, so far as I know, there has never been a contradiction of that statement made by the Philadelphia Press.

Now, that may not correctly represent conditions to-day, but it does illustrate the proposition that the imposition of a high protective duty upon meat raises the cost of meat to the consumers in the United States above that which the people have to pay across the line in Canada, where that rate of duty does not obtain.

Mr. President, a few days ago the New York American published a statement, which it reiterated the next day, that the beef trust was selling in Europe the same meat that it sold to the people of the United States at from 4 to 9 cents a pound less than it sold to the people of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. What was the authority for that statement? Because I have the official figures here, which show the precise opposite.

Mr. BACON. From whom did the Senator get his figures?

Mr. LODGE. They are from the consular report. For the English figures I obtained them from the British board of agriculture, and the others from the current market reports posted every day in the city of Boston.

Mr. BACON. From whom does the American get its figures?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know.

Mr. BACON. Very well; where is the——

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps the Senator is in the confidence of that newspaper and can tell us where it gets its figures.

Mr. BACON. The suggestion is probably a very serious one, that I am in its confidence, and it may throw some light on this question.

Mr. LODGE. I am asking where it got them.

Mr. BACON. A great metropolitan newspaper——

Mr. LODGE. Where did that great metropolitan newspaper get its figures?

Mr. BACON. I presume from the same sources as the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Did it? I am not asking for the Senator's presumption; I am asking for the fact. Did it?

Mr. BACON. I can not say that it did; but I do say this, Mr. President, that a great metropolitan newspaper publishes a statement as a fact and challenges contradiction and reiterates it on the next day or the second day, I have forgotten which, and no one of its contemporaries takes issue with it. We are constantly met by statements made by newspapers, statements made as to current events, statements made as to prices, and they do not in each instance go and state what is the particular source from which the information is obtained. They stake their character and their reputation upon the correctness of the statements.

Mr. WARREN. It is a valuable asset in some cases.

Mr. BACON. Otherwise they would no longer have influence; they would no longer have standing. I submit that the statement of a great metropolitan newspaper as to what are current prices in England is entitled to fully as much credit as a statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, each of them going to sources satisfactory to himself or itself for the purpose of getting information.

I am informed by Senators who sit by me—I did not see it myself—that Secretary Wilson has made the same statement. Now, where did Secretary Wilson get his information?

Mr. LODGE. I should be very glad to see his statement and also his authority. I have been unable to get from the Agricultural Department except what is given here.

Mr. BACON. It may not be from the Agricultural Department, but we know that this matter has become so acute that not only the newspapers but great high public officials are engaged in the consideration of these matters and in the outgiving of the expression of their views, which are published in the newspapers.

I am informed by several Senators sitting around me that the statement has been substantially made by Secretary Wilson. The fact of the business is that a consular report is liable to misstate, just as the conclusion or statement of anyone else is liable to misstate. It is an impossibility that the consul can be absolutely and accurately informed as to all matters. He is liable to be as mistaken as others; and I will suggest that a consul may have a political bias——

Mr. LODGE. These are the figures of the British board of agriculture, which I do not believe has a political bias in this respect. They are not the figures of the consul. The Senator ought not to discuss what I put in until he knows——

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to say in his place that he knows it to be the fact that beef is not sold for less in England and on the Continent than it is sold in the United States?

Mr. LODGE. I mean to say——

GOVERNMENT OF ALASKA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that the bill may be proceeded with and that the first amendment of the committee may be read.

Mr. LODGE. I will ask the Senator to allow me to complete the sentence.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In order not to interrupt this interesting conversation, I will ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

WAGES AND PRICES.

Mr. LODGE. Here is the list. The British board of agriculture reported the prices of English beef in 1908 at 13.13 cents per pound, of American beef at 13.1 cents per pound. It is given by hundredweight. Those are wholesale prices. I take the wholesale prices in Boston, the market quotations, and I find that beef in January, 1908—we have them by quarters—ranged from 6 to 10 cents; in April from 7 to 12 cents; in July from 6 to 14 cents; and in October from 5 to 12 cents; showing a lower average for the price of beef in the Boston market than the average reported by the British board of agriculture.

Those are not old newspaper editorials or what occurred in debate here; they are the best official statistics obtainable. I do not know whether the British board of agriculture is deceiving us. I think it probably is not. I can see no object in its doing so. Therefore I quote their prices and the prices obtained from the Boston market reports as giving unquestionably the prices at which beef sold on those dates.

Mr. BACON. Without going into elaborate discussion of the question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, I will simply say that what he has shown are average prices. That may be true as to average prices, yet in a great many instances the contrary may be true. Doubtless it is true that meat is being sold cheaper there than here. An average of the year is no test of that question. What the Senator reads is an average. I am speaking of concrete facts.

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking of the facts. They are facts given in great detail of the prices.

Mr. BACON. Yes; of the averages.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say——

Mr. LODGE. Excuse me, does the Senator mean to say he would take the prices on a given day and that that settles the prices for the year?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not; nor do I say that taking the average for the year settles the question as to whether or not they have been on occasions selling meat at less than they are asking for it here.

Mr. LODGE. I have never heard of attempting to reach prices in any other way. I can not find any authority worthy of the name that attempts to reach prices in any other way. It is done by our own Bureau of Statistics, in the Department of Commerce and Labor. It is done by the British Board of Trade. It is done by the British Board of Agriculture. It is done by every statistician who knows his business. The only way to get prices is to take the average during a period and find what the range of prices is. The extremes give the range.

Mr. BACON. What might have been true a year ago might not be true now.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator want the prices for 1909? I can give them now.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. Let me finish the statement and then I will yield.

Mr. LODGE. Excuse me; was not the Senator quoting the prices in 1902 a few moments ago?

Mr. BACON. Simply by way of illustration.

Mr. LODGE. I took 1908, which happened to be last figures of the board of agriculture. Does the Senator want 1909? I can give him that.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator let me reply first to what he said? I will hear that also. I am trying to illustrate the fact that the question of what is the average for a year does not settle this question. It might have been that for nine months the beef trust sold for more in England than it sold in America. It might be equally true that for some three months they are selling for less in England than they are selling in America. If that is true, the proposition is not changed by the fact that adding nine and three together the average might show that the price was higher in England than it is in America. Now I will hear the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, touching the reports of the board of agriculture of Great Britain, I will say that perhaps the American Department of Agriculture is just as reliable, and my understanding is that Secretary Wilson stated day before yesterday before the House investigating committee that meat is sold cheaper in England than in the United States. That is my understanding from yesterday's Post. And he added the very significant remark that he found it hard to obtain information on this subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I can only say that I asked the Department of Agriculture for those precise figures, and they could give me nothing. They said they did not know; they did not have them; and I had to go to the Department of Commerce and Labor, which alone has statistics of prices that I have been able to find, and the British figures, which are extremely good.

Mr. BACON. If I understand the contention——

Mr. LODGE. I do not know, or I do not understand, what the Secretary said yesterday. I am not quoting what I understand; I am quoting the only existing official figures which I have been able to find.

Mr. BACON. If I understand correctly the contention of the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. I am not going on hearsay.

Mr. BACON. When boiled down it comes to this proposition, that the imposition of a tariff duty on meat has not raised the price of meat to the American consumer.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it has. I think the——

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. One moment. The Senator has asked me a question, and if he will allow me——

Mr. BACON. I did not ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LODGE. I understood him to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. I did not; but still, I will hear the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until the Senator gets through, and speak in my own time.

Mr. BACON. I am glad that the Senator interrupted me, because it shows the truth of the conclusion I had reached as to the contention of the Senator, that the imposition of a high duty on meat does not raise the price of meat to the American consumer and does not put any additional income from the price of beef into the coffers of the beef trust. Now, if that is the case, I want to ask the Senator what is the object of the duty?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. One moment; I have not got through with the question.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator asked the question.

Mr. BACON. I have not finished it. I did ask the Senator, and I am going to give him a chance to answer. I will repeat it. What is the object of the duty? I will ask a still broader question. What is the Republican party here for, if it is not for the purpose of raising prices by prohibitive protective duties? Now, the Senator has got the question.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator ask a question?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Or is that a statement?

Mr. BACON. It is a question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think that the tariff affects the price of beef. I do think that the combination in Chicago known as the "Chicago packers" have affected the price of beef; and I should like very much to reach them in some way. I believe they have advanced it artificially by combination, and that they have advanced it more than it ought to be advanced, and out of all proportion.

I do not think you can reach them through the tariff. I think it is the simplest economic proposition in the world. We are great beef producers. There are only three countries in the world that have edible animals to export—this country, Australia, and the Argentine.

Now, that being the case, the mere removal of the duty will not affect the price of beef, because we do not import beef. We can not import beef from countries that have no surplus to export. We are the exporters of beef. It brings it back to exactly what I said, that you have to deal with the difficulty of an artificial combination. You can not reach them through the tariff. I wish you could. If you could reach them through the tariff I should be most happy to see that duty taken off, but there is no use in undertaking to fool the people about it. If you take the duty off of beef you do not affect the power of that trust to raise the price of beef to the American people one particle.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, the Senator complained that I did not let him answer the question. I do not think the Senator has answered my question. I want to give him another chance at it. I want to know, if the tariff on beef does not raise the price of beef and put a larger revenue into the coffers of the beef trust, for what purpose is the tariff on beef?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suppose there are people who believe that it protects us against the invasion of Mexican and Canadian cattle. I do not believe myself it would have any effect. I answer only for myself. I believe from the protective standpoint it is a perfectly useless duty.

Mr. BACON. Then, in order that the Senator may not complain that I do not give him an opportunity to answer, I will ask him another question. I find in the list of Senators on the yea-and-nay vote I have just read the vote of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. You do.

Mr. BACON. Against giving the opportunity to lower the tariff on beef. Why did the Senator vote against giving that opportunity?

Mr. LODGE. Because it was perfectly useless to do it, and I wanted to pass the bill. We did reduce it, as a matter of fact, and it was useless. We reduced the duty on beef and it had no effect, and I did not think it would have any effect. If we had taken it all off, it would have had just as little effect as taking the duty off of hides. We took 15 per cent off of hides. Why has it not lowered the price of hides if it is the duty? There is the same trust involved in hides that is involved in beef. They are controlled by packers. The 15 per cent was to help them and to help the tanner, the combination of tanners, so much debated last year. We took off 15 per cent, as the Senator wants us to do. What effect did it have in lowering the prices? None. If you take off the tariff on beef, it will have no effect. I believe there is an artificial combination to raise the price of beef, and I am not going to try to humbug the American people by telling them that taking off the duty, when we are exporters of beef, is going to give them relief, when relief is not to be had in that way. They ought to reach it by proper means.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when this question was before the Senate the fact was brought out, stated by Senators—I recollect stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]—that if the tariff was removed from beef there would be beef brought into this country from Canada. There is no argument in the suggestion that because the lowering of one-quarter of the tariff has not resulted in the lowering of the price of beef, because, non constat, if it had remained at two, the price would have been still higher.

Mr. LODGE. We took it all off hides. Why did it not lower the price of hides?

Mr. BACON. I am not familiar with the question of hides.

Mr. LODGE. Hides are part of cattle.

Mr. BACON. I know we took the duty off of hides.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator voted for it, if I mistake not.

Mr. BACON. For free hides, I did; but I say I am not familiar with the hide features.

Mr. LODGE. Hides and beef are the beef-cattle products.

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether the opportunity has yet been presented since the passage of the bill for the competition from Argentina and otherwise would have its full influence and effect.

Mr. LODGE. They made purchases of hides within forty-eight hours after the bill passed—purchases abroad.

Mr. BACON. Very well; that may be true.

Mr. LODGE. Business is not done by the month; it is done by cable.

Mr. BACON. It is true of the entire protective-tariff system, and beef is no exception to it, that the purpose of it is to raise prices. It was stated a hundred times in the debate which we had here during the extra session that that is the purpose. Why should it be true in one case and not true in others? The effect of putting a protective tariff upon one article is to raise prices, and unless they are exceptional facts, why will it not raise the price as to others?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has referred to me, and has credited me with saying that the removal of the duty on cattle would probably result in the importation of cattle from Canada.

Mr. BACON. And the Senator voted for the proposition to give the opportunity for lowering the prices.

Mr. GALLINGER. I believe that would have been the result. But I said something else. I said that in my judgment the removal of the duty on hides would not reduce the price of hides; and I voted to retain the duty on hides, notwithstanding there are perhaps in proportion to population more people engaged in the boot and shoe industry in my little State than in any other State in the Union.

I said furthermore that I did not believe—and in that matter I combatted some of my best friends—that the removal of the duty on hides would reduce the price of boots and shoes. The result has been that it has not reduced their price. For some inscrutable reason the price of boots and shoes has been advanced. I think that the fact is, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggests, that the price of hides has advanced also; but I do not know how that is.

Mr. WARREN. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the contention of the Senator from Massachusetts that we shall find a remedy, if we find it at all, in controlling the combinations that have taken possession of the cattle market and the hide market is probably the right direction for us to look in considering this question.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt there are other influences, Mr. President; I have no doubt that it is true that a very considerable part of the remedy must be sought in the direction now indicated by the learned Senator from New Hampshire. I come back, however, to the substantial, fundamental proposition that, whatever may be true as to other influences, the imposition of a tariff of 1½ cents upon every pound of beef must necessarily influence the price of beef and raise it to the consumer, and that the purpose of the imposition of it was to do so.

Mr. President, the fact that we are not importers does not settle the quesion. As stated, I recollect, by myself in discussing the question of the tariff as to bacon, lard, and other things where the importation was extremely small, while the importation was small, the imposition of a duty gives to the domestic producer, or to the trust which controls the product, the excuse and opportunity to raise the price, because they know that they will be protected against the effort of anyone to compete with them.

Mr. President, I alluded to an article which had appeared in the New York American. I have the article here before me, which has been kindly handed to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], which was the one to which I alluded, and which alludes to the other article. I will read a part of it, if not all of it. It is, as I have said, from the New York American. It appeared in the Washington Post yesterday, being copied into that paper:

METHODS OF THE FOOD TRUST—COMBINATION THAT STANDS BETWEEN NATURE AND THE PEOPLE.

The American would like to believe that the Armours, Swifts, and Morrises were the innocent victims of circumstances; that the gourd-like growth of big business had caught them unawares and placed them in dizzy seats of power whose responsibilities they had tried to grasp, but could not.

It would be a pleasant compliment to human nature if one could say that the magnates of the beef trust really think that what they say is true—that their business methods have nothing to do with the great damage that is being suffered by the people, and that high prices are due to the course of nature and not to monopoly.

But, unhappily, it is wholly impossible to believe in the sincerity of the trustified packers.

Here is the point that I call the statement of fact by the New York American, which is quoted in this article:

The American showed yesterday morning, for example, that the American beef trust was selling beef in London at prices ranging from 4 to 9 cents lower than its prices in New York.

Mr. President, I repeat when a great metropolitan newspaper makes a statement of that kind, especially when it alludes to a former article in which it says it has shown it, doubtless at the time giving the basis of its statement, that it is entitled to credit, and it is not to be overcome by a question of what was a general average of the price of meat for the whole year in England and in America. The question is, What are they doing now? Is it true now—not whether it was true as a general average for a year, but is it true now, as stated by the New York American, that the beef trust is selling beef in England from 4 to 9 cents a pound less than it is selling it in America? That is the question; and it is a question not to be answered by consular reports giving the averages of a year, or by board of trade reports giving the averages of a year. What is the trust doing now? If the Senator has any contrary information to that as to what it is doing now, then it is pertinent in reference to this question.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator from Georgia accord to the New York American the same high degree of authority and good judgment as to what may have been done or said, or what may be done, by the Democratic party as he does as to what it says concerning the price of beef?

Mr. BACON. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. WARREN. I wanted to ask the Senator if he gives the same confidence to the reliability and soundness of the observations made by the New York American with regard to political matters, with regard to leading Democrats and the Democratic party, as he seems to accord that paper as to beef prices, and so forth?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know of any higher evidence of the fact that the Senator can not meet the issue than that he tries to divert it in any such way as that—to divert the question to something entirely immaterial.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator himself cites Mr. Hearst's paper as the final authority, and I cite reports of boards of trade and the current market reports in Boston or in any other large city, which everybody can read, and the Senator from Georgia scoffs and says that board of trade reports are not to be trusted; that we must trust Mr. Hearst's paper, a great metropolitan journal.

Mr. BACON. I have not said so. The Senator misquotes me.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has been finding fault with the official reports. I quote official reports. The Senator scorns them and quotes Mr. Hearst's paper.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I will not say that he intentionally misquotes me, but he is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has quoted Mr. Hearst's paper.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, he is mistaken. I am not scouting consular reports and board of trade reports. I am saying that the consular reports are averages and the board of trade reports are averages of the year. The New York American's statements are as to what is occurring now. There is no conflict between the two.

Mr. LODGE. It is very easy to get those reports now. You can get to-day's quotations very easily.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The Senator will undoubtedly have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Why take quotations in editorials?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Massachusetts will undoubtedly have his opportunity. This is not the last we are going to hear of this, Mr. President. When people are hungry and can not get meat, one little discussion is not going to end the matter; it is going to be heard from repeatedly. The Senator from Massachusetts will have the opportunity to bring all the figures he wants, and doubtless others with whom he takes issue will bring figures, and we will see what the fact is—not what was the average for twelve months, but what the fact now is. Is it true, as stated by the New York American, that the beef trust is selling beef in England at from 4 to 9 cents a pound less than it is selling it to the American people? That is the question—not what the trust has been doing for a year, but what it is doing now.

Mr. President, I have another little statement of prices which I wish to submit to the Senate. It is true this also comes from a newspaper, but it is a very reliable newspaper, which is published in my own town. It quotes from others, and, of course, it must rely upon the veracity of the party from whom it quotes. I am going to give the figures. If they are not correct, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] will be in a position to show that they are not correct within a very few days, because the prices quoted relate to his State.

Mr. OVERMAN. I presume the Senator from Georgia intended to refer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. BACON. No; I say the Senator from Michigan, because it relates to prices in his State. If I am stating it incorrectly, there can be a speedy correction of it. I will read the article in full; it is not long. It is from the Macon Telegraph, a very conservative paper. While it does not state anything upon its own knowledge, it would not quote it unless it believed it to be true. The article is headed "The tariff in practice." It proceeds as follows:

The upward leap of food prices all over the United States has served to awaken the interest of the people of Detroit in the tariff question, according to a dispatch from that city. While commodities of all sorts, most of which are heavily "protected," have become more and more expensive in Detroit, at Windsor, just across the river in Canada, the cost of living has departed but little from the normal. "It is 25 per cent cheaper to live in Canada than in the United States," says the dispatch—

Then, continuing the quotation, it says—

"and the tariff, the pressure of which had been more keenly felt since the Payne-Aldrich 'revision,' is considered largely responsible, in view of the fact that natural conditions ought not to vary so greatly within a short half mile."

That is a quotation from the dispatch. Then the editor proceeds:

But to cross the river and buy goods 25 per cent cheaper does not pay, when, on returning, the United States customs officer claps on them a duty of 60 per cent and upward. So it would seem that the Detroit people can do no more than look across the international boundary with longing eyes. The dispatch gives the following specimens of prices in the neighboring American and Canadian towns:

This is a quotation from the dispatch which is reproduced in this article. These are the prices, which I now read, published in this dispatch. It gives the commodities, the prices in Windsor, and the prices in Detroit.

Commodity.	Price in Windsor.	Price in Detroit.
Butter, best, per pound	$0.28	$0.36
Eggs, per dozen	.34	.42
Beef, cheapest cut	.06½	.10
Pork, mess	.13	.20
Lard, prime	.11	.13
Bacon, breakfast	.19	.24
Wheat, No. 2 red	1.00	1.11

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. I will yield after I have finished reading the table. I wish the Senator would allow me to complete that. I do not wish to interrupt that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well.

Mr. BACON. The table continues as follows:

Commodity.	Price in Windsor.	Price in Detroit.
Corn, No. 2 mixed	$0.60	$0.78
Potatoes, per bushel	.70	.65
Cabbage, per head	$0.05–.07	$0.08–.15
Turnips, per bushel	.40	.60
Carrots, per bushel	.50	.60
Rutabagas, per bushel	.35	.40
Beets, per bushel	.25	.60
Parsnips, per bushel	.50	.60
Turkeys, dressed	.20	.25
Chickens, dressed	.11	.15
Milk, per quart	.07	.08–.09
Cheese, per pound	.11½	.16⅔
Plug tobacco, per pound	1.00	2.00-2.00

The editor then proceeds to say:

It is quite evident from this showing that there is much smuggling across from Windsor and that this has lowered prices in Detroit. The people of the latter are fortunate if they can buy "best" butter at 36 cents, for example. In some of the other American cities good butter is now selling at 47 cents, and there is a "best" still higher in price. The comparison of prices in Detroit and just across the Canadian border is a useful object lesson, however, and its wide circulation will do no harm.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia to read again the differenee in the price of beef between Detroit and Windsor.

Mr. BACON. The quotation as to beef is not as complete as it should be. It simply gives the price of the cheapest cuts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the quotation as to beef?

Mr. BACON. The price is quoted at 6½ cents in Windsor and 10 cents in Detroit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia how much the tariff duty of a cent and a half a pound on beef plays in that price?

The tariff could only add a cent and a half a pound. The discrepancy between the cost in Detroit and in Windsor is about 5 cents. According to the Senator's theory, according to his own figures, the tariff has not gotten its full return. We only assessed it at a cent and a half a pound, and yet there is a difference of 5 cents a pound in the price.

Mr. BACON. No, no; the Senator's mathematics is not good.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I call upon the Senator to state the difference. I did not quite catch his figures. It is 3½ cents?

Mr. BACON. The difference between 6½ cents and 10 cents is 3½ cents, and not 5 cents.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Three and a half cents.

Mr. BACON. That is why I suggested that the Senator was not accurate in his mathematics.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is certainly not making a very strong argument when he points to the tariff as the cause of that discrepancy. The difference is three and a half cents.

Mr. BACON. Yes; three and a half cents.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is 2 cents a pound more than the tariff.

Mr. BACON. Yes. Well, Mr. President, 2 cents.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a plain, simple question.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has asked me one question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I would like a straight answer.

Mr. BACON. One moment, if the Senator please——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why do not the people of Detroit bring over that beef when they can make 2 cents on every pound?

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator deny the fact as to prices?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I say that it does not seem possible that they will sell beef on one side of the Detroit River at the price quoted by the Senator from Georgia, when they could go right across the river, pay the duty, and sell it for 2 cents a pound more.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the tariff on beef is on all classes of beef, but there may be particular conditions which will——

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Senator to say——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me until I finish the sentence—there may be particular conditions which will relate to one class of beef that do not relate to another. What is lost on one may be made up on another.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the price in Detroit was 10 cents a pound for the cheapest cut?

Mr. BACON. I did not say anything about the average.

Mr. LODGE. No; but did not the Senator say that that was the quotation on only the cheapest cut?

Mr. BACON. I am reading from the paper.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. BACON. The cheapest cuts?

Mr. LODGE. On the cheapest cuts the quotation was 6½ cents in Windsor and 10 cents in Detroit?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I see, by referring to the market quotations, that the quotations on the cheapest cuts in Boston are 5 cents.

Mr. BACON. That may be true.

Mr. LODGE. That is now; that is not 1902; that is at the present time.

Mr. BACON. That may be true, and at the same time it may not affect the correctness of the statement.

Mr. LODGE. Why should the price be so much cheaper in one American city than in another? I think the Senator's figures are perhaps mistaken.

Mr. BACON. Possibly they are, but I have stated the fact that they are based upon a dispatch from Detroit; and if they are not correct the Senator from Michigan has the opportunity to get the correct statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. I have not answered the Senator's previous question; but I will listen to him now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say that if I thought the tariff on beef was the cause of the present high price of beef, I would vote to repeal that tariff as soon as the roll could be called.

Mr. President, I voted to take the duty off hides because I did not wish to be charged with maintaining a trust in leather that might perhaps drive the tanners in this country out of business. I thought they ought to have an opportunity to buy their leather in the largest possible market, but I did not believe that it would lower the cost of leather, and I do not believe, if you take the tariff off beef, that it would lower the price of beef.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator rose to ask me a question, and he is making a speech. I will interrupt him and ask him a question. Does the Senator dispute the proposition that beef sells for less in Canada than it sells for in Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would not be at all surprised if it did; and, Mr. President, I would not be at all surprised if labor and other products were cheaper in Canada than in Michigan——

Mr. BACON. Ah, well——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because a great many hundreds of people from Canada come over every day to work in the mills and factories of Michigan and go back home and live off the cheaper products of their own country.

Mr. BACON. Then, as I understand the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, it is this, that the specific duty imposed on beef does not raise the price of beef to the consumer, but——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

Mr. BACON. Wait a moment—but that the general tariff system of the country does make beef higher to every man who buys it and eats it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Georgia intends to charge that the general tariff system creates a healthier industrial condition here than would otherwise be the result, then I admit what he says to be true.

Mr. BACON. In other words——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because my mind takes me back to a time when you sought to enlarge the market for the products that were necessary for mankind, and you did it at the expense of our own domestic market and were driven out of power for doing it.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but I am not going back to that, because I do not intend for the Senator to get away from the present. The present is what we are dealing with. Enough can be said upon the last suggestion of the Senator, but I am not going to be diverted. Do I understand the Senator's proposition to be this: That the general tariff system results in such an increase of the prices of beef that the health of the people of the United States is made all the better because they can not buy beef, and for that reason he is in favor of the maintenance of a general protective tariff system, in order that the health of the people of the United States may be enhanced and improved by taking out of their mouths the beef that they have been accustomed to eat in the past?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Wholesome, as the doctrine of the vegetarian may be, I have not embraced it; but I do not believe that the tariff on beef adds a single penny to its cost. The illustration given by the Senator from Georgia is very clear upon that point. He says that the price of beef at Windsor, in Canada, just across the river from Detroit, is 6½ cents, while in Detroit it is 10 cents. The tariff is a cent and a half. How can the Senator account for the discrepancy?

Mr. BACON. There are plenty of ways to account for the discrepancy. There is no use for us to go into details. There are plenty of ways for those who are familiar with the trade to show that the effect upon one class of meat is greater than it is upon another, and it may be that that particular class is so insignificant as not to invite the trade that the Senator said would be invited by the discrepancy in price.

Mr. President, Senators may struggle as much as they please, but they are confronted by the proposition that they are seeking to establish the contention that, while they insisted upon a tariff upon beef, it has no effect upon the price; and that, while they maintain it as a general proposition that the tariff imposed upon all the articles embraced within the provisions of the protective tariff raises the prices of those articles, it does not do it in the particular class of beef; and yet they insist on maintaining the tariff on beef.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me at that point, I never maintained any such proposition in what I said here this morning.

Mr. BACON. I was trying to answer the Senator from Michigan at that particular time.

Mr. LODGE. I carefully differentiated the various classes; but I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a question, if the Senator from Michigan will allow me. I notice that the Senator voted against the reduction of the duty on lumber.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Did the Senator do that on the theory that the price would be raised by keeping on the dollar and a half?

Mr. BACON. I am not going back to a discussion of those things.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator would not.

Mr. BACON. Possibly——

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to entertain the Senator from Massachusetts on that.

Mr. BACON. I wanted to finish my answer, but the Senator from Massachusetts was not anxious to hear it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to go back into those old discussions.

Mr. BACON. The Senator was anxious not to hear my answer. I was about to say that that matter had been fully discussed, and that I voted for it because it was a revenue-duty. [Laughter.] That is a matter that amuses Senators on the other side very much.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. They do not recognize the fact that it is possible for an American Senator to be influenced by an honest purpose to raise revenue for the Government, but think that all Senators must be influenced solely by the desire in the fixing of a tariff to put into the pockets of one individual the money taken out of the pockets of another. They think that all Senators must be influenced by that motive, and that it is an impossibility that any Senator could be influenced by the motive of a patriotic service to the Government.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President, I do not question the patriotism of the Senator from Georgia at all, but I always admired——

Mr. BACON. But the Senator can not realize that anybody could have such a motive.

Mr. LODGE. I entirely realize the purity of the Senator's motives, but I always am amused when I observe the extreme flexibility of a revenue duty——

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. And how the revenue limit increases as it reaches a home industry.

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President; that is not true. The Senator from Massachusetts and those with whom he is in affiliation—not all of them—are so accustomed to coming to the capital of the Nation and trying to so shape the legislation of the country that favored classes and favored individuals may fill their pockets in ways other than by the results of their own legitimate industry, that they can not realize that any other motive can possibly inspire any Senator in voting for a rate of duty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator said he voted for a dollar and a half duty on lumber.

Mr. GALLINGER. Two dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Two dollars, I should have said.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not. I voted for the rate which was fixed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A dollar and seventy-five cents?

Mr. BAILEY. It was not fixed at a dollar and seventy-five cents, but it was fixed at a dollar and twenty-five cents; and when the Senator from Georgia voted for a dollar and a half he voted for a 25 per cent reduction of the duty on lumber, reducing it from 12 per cent down to 9 per cent.

Mr. BACON. I never did vote for its increase.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As a protectionist, I voted for a dollar, because I thought that was enough.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator simply wanted to protect a class of people in Michigan. After cutting away their forests, now they want to bring in their lumber, and they want to bring it in as low as possible.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have cut away their forests, and they now have cities that are prosperous, contented, and happy as the result of it.

Mr. BAILEY. And they need lumber.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I want to say further, in answer to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], that when he undertakes to compare Detroit and Windsor prices he ought not to overlook the fact that Detroit, with the same natural advantages upon that river, has multiplied its manufactures over and over again, until it shows during the decade now closing a marvelous growth and industrial development; its people are employed and new enterprises are attracted to it from all over the country——

Mr. BACON. Is that a question to me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. While Windsor, which is a type the Senator would praise, is torpid and stands just about where it was twenty-five or thirty years ago.

Mr. BACON. What was the last remark of the Senator? I did not catch it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I say Windsor——

Mr. BACON. What about twenty-five or thirty years ago?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The type that the Senator praises——

Mr. BACON. What type?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The type of cities—the tariff-for-revenue cities——

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A good type of Democratic cities. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It stands just about where it did twenty-five or thirty years ago.

Mr. BACON. I am astonished that the Senator, with his usual information, should suggest that the cities in the part of the country which advocates a tariff for revenue have stood still for twenty-five or thirty years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say that.

Mr. BACON. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; Windsor is not in the United States; it is in Canada.

Mr. BACON. I am not talking about that. I do not know anything about Windsor or what its politics are or anything else, but I know a good deal about the cities in this country. If the Senator had intended to refer to those cities, I should have given him a little contrast between the development of those cities—200, 400, 500 per cent increase in population, and not standing still by any means.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and, Mr. President, 400 and 500 per cent increase under what? Under the tariff principles that our party has felt were so essential to the prosperity of the country.

Mr. BACON. By no means, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. I will hear him through if he wishes, but when I resume I desire to be heard myself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am perfectly willing; I do not want to deprive the Senator of the floor.

Mr. BACON. I will hear the Senator through.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I say that the important cities in the South stand as great tributes to the policy of protection which our country has pursued for so many years; no better illustrations can be found anywhere on the continent.

Mr. BACON. I say, Mr. President, if the Senator has finished, that he is entirely in error.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have finished that much.

Mr. BACON. I say that the Senator is entirely in error.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The only time——

Mr. BACON. I asked the Senator if he had finished.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BACON. If he has not, I will hear him through before I resume.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the basis of the wealth of the entire South, upon which its other wealth has been built up, has been the production of cotton, and so far from that basis of wealth having had any advantage from the protective system, it has hung like a millstone around the necks of those engaged in that industry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment. The Senator will please wait. It has hung like a millstone around the necks of those engaged in that industry out of which all of the other wealth has grown.

I do not desire to retain the floor for the purpose of making a harangue. I expected to be on the floor ten or fifteen minutes, but Senators have kindly interested themselves in the subject, and it has led from one thing to another. But we must not be led away from the straight proposition, the one that the people of the United States are now so deeply interested in, Does the imposition of a tariff duty upon meat raise the price of meat to the consumer?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. I do not yield now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BACON. I will yield later. Does the tariff on meat raise the price of meat to the consumer? That is one question. The other question is whether this overgrown, gigantic protective system, in its influence upon the prices in this country of all articles which are protected, has not operated, independent of the specific duty upon beef, to raise the price of it to a point that has created a rebellion among the American people of all classes and all conditions? That is the question to which the Senator must address himself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand, the price of cotton is very high.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And there is no tariff on it.

Mr. MONEY. The price is due to a small crop.

Mr. BACON. There is no tariff on cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The high price can not be attributed to the tariff——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may be attributable to the increased demand for cotton goods——

Mr. BACON. No——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may be attributable to the small crop.

Mr. BACON. That is a fact.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To be perfectly fair, it must be attributable to the one cause or the other. Is it not just possible that the busy men of America, with the prosperous condition among our people, have caused an excessive demand for beef products, as well as for other products, and that the supply may be short? If that is so, it is hardly fair to attribute to the tariff the present rise in price and the present cost.

The Senator has argued himself away from his first premise—the difference between the cost in Windsor and in Detroit. Surely that difference is not attributable to the tariff, and no one could for a moment contend it was, except as it might be generally related to the industrial activity of our people over which we should all rejoice.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Michigan performs a double rôle, each one with great skill and ability. He asks me a question and answers it for me. I am certainly under great obligations to him for relieving me of that duty, although I decline to accept the reply he has made as the one I would have made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then I have not answered it for the Senator, if he does not adopt it.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator asked me a question and immediately proceeded to answer it. He has done so several times, and I acknowledge my indebtedness to him for his kindness in that regard. But he has not answered the question which I asked, and it is a question which the American people are asking. I am glad Senators are speaking as frankly as they do to-day. The American people are asking two questions.

First, does the specific duty put upon fresh meat enhance the price that has to be paid for it by the consumer. That is one question, and I think they will answer that in the affirmative. I observe that a bill has been introduced in another branch of this Congress, where alone it can be introduced, taking off the duty on beef; and I presume the issue will be made, and the American people will watch to see how that issue is met and by whom it is met.

The next question, and it is a broader question, is, whether or not, as I said, this overgrown and gigantic protective system, prohibitive in large measure, has so raised the price of all articles which are consumed by the people, and which are protected in the tariff schedules, that the price of necessary food has unavoidably been affected thereby and made almost impossible to the consumer.

Those are the two questions, and I am glad to see the Senators here not shirk the question. They are not all of that opinion; and when I say "the Senators" I do not mean all, but I mean those who have spoken to-day. They do not shirk the questions, and they answer both in the negative. Senators on the other side say, in the first place, that the imposition of the specific duty upon meat has not raised the price to the consumer, and yet they insist upon the retention of the specific duty. They say, in the second place, that the general raising of prices throughout the country upon protected articles has not had what I consider to be its natural and unavoidable influence in raising to these exorbitant rates the price of meat.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, he answered a question just now and he did not answer it in the way I would answer it, and I want him to let me finish the reply, and then I will yield to him. In fact, I do not know but that I will yield the floor, and then listen to the Senator with great pleasure.

The Senator has alluded to the question of the price of cotton. The price of cotton, as he correctly says, is not affected by the tariff except indirectly; the tariff does affect very seriously the net amount which the raiser of cotton puts in his pocket, because it makes the cost to him of raising the cotton very much more than it would otherwise be, by the fact that it makes him pay exorbitant prices for everything used by him in the production of the cotton.

The price of cotton in the world is not affected by the tariff. It is affected by the world's estimate of the supply and demand. The price of cotton is not fixed in any one locality. It is true that it centers at one place, because it is the great center of the cotton industry, to wit, in Liverpool. But it is a world's price. It is a world's price determined by the question of the extent of the supply and how far that supply will meet the demand. The price of cotton this year has gone very high, because the supply is 20 or 25 per cent below the normal and below the demand. Thirty per cent my friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] tells me. It is 30 per cent below the normal supply, with the world demanding it—not one locality or one country, but the whole world demanding it, and the whole world in competition for it—and consequently the price has gone up. But non constat the very next year the price of cotton may be one-half what it is to-day.

Nobody, I presume, will suggest that as to beef. Not only that, but the price of cotton being fixed as a world's price, you will never find cotton being sold in Liverpool for less than in America—never. Nor do I apprehend, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], that it will be found to be less in Windsor than it is in Detroit. The conditions are entirely different. The things which operate and control are entirely different.

The illustration of the Senator, while he answered it for me in a manner entirely satisfactory to himself, is no answer at all, because it has no relevancy to it whatever.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have any desire to retain the floor further, but I will endeavor to answer any question Senators may desire to propound.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Since I have been in public life, under stress of a popular agitation, in the dead of winter, when people were very much alarmed over their inability to get coal, I voted to repeal the duty on coal, under just such a situation as the Senator describes to-day with reference to beef, and yet there is not a Senator in this Chamber——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, answering the question——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me finish. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who will say that the price of coal was reduced a penny by reason of our having taken off the tariff.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Everybody knows it was not. The Senator knows that the supply of beef from without this country is very limited, and that our own people have been very greatly concerned over the present condition of our market. I presume somebody on the other side of the Chamber will suggest before long that we ought to take the duty off of beef in order to reduce the price to the consumer; and, if I had the power to say what this side of the Chamber would do, I would call your bluff and take the duty off. And I will venture the assertion that it would not lower the price of beef at all. The place to handle the present beef problem is not in the legislative forum; it is in the court. There is sufficient law. The question now to be determined is whether it has been violated.

Mr. STONE. What is the need of any duty at all on beef?

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Surely.

Mr. MONEY. I want to understand the Senator from Michigan. What does he mean by "calling a bluff?" What is that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I never before made that statement in the presence of a Southerner that he did not seem to understand it.

Mr. MONEY. I do not know what the Senator means.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Knowing the distinguished Senator from Mississippi as I do, covering a period of so many years, I am ready to believe he does not understand it.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Michigan explain it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is that sanctimonious and unconcerned look which an experienced man sometimes exhibits when he affects to hold a good hand and wants to play it to his own advantage.

Mr. MONEY. Does the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the able and honorable Senator from Georgia unwittingly betrayed that appearance.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan calls it a bluff. The Senator, I find, did not vote on the question when it was before the Senate last summer. He was absent, I presume, or was paired with some one who was absent. It was not then considered a bluff, and yet our attitude then was just exactly what it is now. Why is it a bluff now and was not a bluff then? We believed then that the imposition of a specific duty upon beef would result and was resulting in increased cost to the consumer. We believed it then earnestly, sincerely. We were not accused then of playing a bluff hand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator believed that the removal of the duty on leather would reduce the price of leather, but his judgment has not proven very good.

Mr. BACON. It has been suggested by the Senator from Texas that I do not understand what a bluff is or I would not have used that expression. I plead guilty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I sincerely hope the Senator will not turn me over to the tender mercies of the Senator from Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. I asked the Senator from Georgia in good faith a question which he promised to answer before he took his seat.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon. I will do so now if I can.

Mr. WARREN. I asked the Senator if putting a tariff on beef raised the price, why the lowering of the tariff to the extent of 25 per cent did not reduce the price; and he has not answered.

Mr. BACON. I think I did. I will repeat it——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, I waited very patiently.

Beef is just as much an agricultural crop as is cotton, and it is as liable to the same changes up and down, due to a shortage or an abundance. Unfortunately, perhaps, or fortunately, as the Senator may view it, the beef growth of this and other countries is not keeping up with the growth of population.

This juggling of figures, talking about what is the cheapest cut of beef, shows the looseness with which not only Senators but newspapers speak of that product. There is no such standard known as the "cheapest cut of beef" when you come down to handling it. A man may say that 6 cents is the price of the cheap cuts, or 20 cents. As a matter of fact, when you take a beef steer and sell it on the market you sell some parts for 3 and 4 cents a pound, and some parts for 30 cents or more. It is very easy for newspapers to establish a price of their own in a comparison of prices in two towns or districts, but when you come down to the real prices, the only basis of comparison is first to take well-known terms, as to loin steak and round steak and so on, take the standard market prices published from day to day. The idea of ridiculing averages, with all respect to the Senator, seems to me ridiculous in itself, because the price of one item one day—as the Senator says with respect to cotton—may, because of a shortage or a surplus, be higher or lower one day than another. Cotton may be higher one year than another; possibly, on account of speculation alone; it may be very much higher in the forenoon of one day than in the afternoon. Those differences occur, but the only businesslike way to compare it, and the only phase of it that the consumer is interested in, is the average—the price from day to day and year to year, as it averages.

It has been sought here to prove by the Secretary of Agriculture that beef is selling abroad much cheaper than here, and the inference given that he is willing to state that the tariff is the cause. If I understand the language of the Secretary of Agriculture correctly, he takes just the other view. He says it is not due to the tariff, but to the middlemen; that is, to the retailers and the wholesalers.

I have in my time known of as low a price as $12.50 for a beef animal on the range, and yet I have started for New York on the same day, and arriving at New York I paid as high as $3.50 for a beefsteak for myself and friends, served in a hotel or restaurant; and it took only a small item, an atom you might say, of the whole beef animal; yet it cost a quarter as much to get a beefsteak served in fashionable eastern places as the entire animal cost in the West—the beef animal weighing perhaps 1,000 pounds, the beefsteak less than 5 pounds.

These conditions are regrettable. I hope they will mend. But ever since I have known anything of the beef market and the cotton market and other markets of produce, they are bound to go up and down with the scarcity or plentifulness of the crop and with the market that is made by the volume of consumption.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there is one phase of this question which may have been suggested when I was called out of the Chamber for a moment; but if it was I did not hear it, and I think no discussion of the question is complete without it.

Everybody seems to overlook the enormously increased cost of bringing the fattened steer to market. In our country, where they use the product of cotton seed to feed cattle, the price of cotton-seed meal has risen from a normal price of $19 or $20 a ton to $32 a ton. There is an increase of more than 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Texas permit me right there?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. To-day the market price for corn——

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to refer to corn——

Mr. WARREN. Is over 50 cents per bushel, whereas some years ago in precisely the same localities it was burned for fuel, and I have seen it sold later for 8 and 9 cents a bushel. To-day it is between 50 and 60 cents a bushel, and of course it is as necessary as cotton-seed meal and other foodstuffs to fatten cattle.

Mr. BAILEY. I was proceeding to refer to the great West and great Northwest, where they use corn to fatten cattle, and where the price of corn over a period of several years ago has more than doubled. Over even the recent price there is a very substantial advance. The corn crop last year was, I believe, the largest in the history of the United States, but there have been discovered so many additional uses for corn that there has been a call for even a larger increase in the crop than the farms have yielded.

Corn is the most wonderful product in the world. You can make more different things out of it than from any other one substance known to mankind. You can make the liquid whisky or the solid bread. You can make sweet sugar or sour vinegar out of it. There are innumerable articles into the production or the manufacture of which corn increasingly enters, and the fact is that instead of there having to be a normal corn crop to preserve the normal price, there must be an enormous increase in the production of corn to avoid an enormous increase in its price.

Not only is it true as to the price of cattle that must be fattened by feeding them, as occurs in the fall, in the winter, and in the spring, but it is almost equally true as to range cattle, because in former years there were great areas where cattle were grazed on land worth $1.50 an acre, but the same land has now advanced to $5, $10, and $15 an acre. Under this condition cattle could not sell to-day, as they once sold, for $12 to $15 a head, as stated by the Senator from Wyoming. With cattle selling at such a price one of two things would happen—either the price of land would fall, or else its owners would be compelled to abandon cattle raising and devote their land to other uses.

I sympathize with everybody in the world who must go hungry, but I have little sympathy with the city folks who for forty years have been charging the American farmers high prices for everything they wear, high prices for all the implements with which they cultivate their farms, and now, when for one brief year the farmer seems coming into his own, cry out and attempt to organize a boycott. That is a dangerous weapon. It is a two-edged sword. Against it I warn the city folks of this Republic. If the farmers of the United States were to organize a boycott and agree to buy no more clothes or hats or shoes for twelve months, I wonder what would become of our cities? Farmers can better live without new clothes and hats and shoes than the city folks can without bread and meat. I spent a large part of my time from 1893 to 1896 complaining against low prices, and I shall not spend much of my time now complaining because they have advanced.

Mr. President, there is another question which we may just as well face. While you are talking about the conservation of national resources, you had better be giving more heed to the conservation of individual resources. Important as it may be to preserve our minerals, our forests, and our water power, it is infinitely more important to teach our people to increase the fertility and the productivity of their farms. If you will teach the farmer to conserve his individual resources, if you will instruct him how the better to cultivate his fields, you will perform a service immeasurably more important in the centuries to come than all that you may do about the public domain.

Wonderful progress has already been made in this direction. I was born in the long-leaf pine region of Mississippi, and I remember an occasion when one of those constituents of the Senator from Michigan came down there to buy a vast tract of that land. When he saw the Michigan forests disappearing, when Michigan no longer wanted a high tariff on lumber, because she did not have any to sell and wanted it low, because her people were compelled to buy lumber, this astute Michigan lumber man came to Mississippi and negotiated a trade with one of the best men I ever knew, who bore the illustrious name of Benjamin Franklin Martin. At the time I was a young lawyer, just called to the bar, and had been sent for to draw a contract, if any was made. As they drove through the great pine forests this shrewd Michigander, in order to put down the price, kept talking about the poverty of the soil, and repeated it for the fifth or the sixth or the tenth or the eleventh time; I know he had repeated it until it had become wearisome to my friend and client, and when he finally said, "What can you raise in this country?" old Ben Martin drew himself up and said, "We raise men, and that appears to be more than they do where you come from." I do not say that is true of Michigan, but that was one of my early experiences as to the poverty of that soil.

It is true that the best of our agricultural people thought that the virgin soil was the richest, not only to begin with, but to end with, and after a few years of cultivation they turned it out to become an old field. That is true of Alabama, I take it, as it was in Mississippi; and yet I have seen under an intelligent system of cultivation those old fields reclaimed and made into smiling gardens.

We have learned now that if the farmer will cultivate his mind and cultivate his field at the same time, the longer he cultivates the land the greater abundance it will yield, and before we see again the prices of food products that once prevailed in this country we must increase the capacity of our soil to produce those things which contribute to the comfort and the life of the people. With an increasing population and a stable quantity of soil the price of agricultural products must rise, and they will rise even above their present prices, unless our farmers, by improving their methods, can make the same acreage yield a greater abundance, and that will reward the farmer without overtaxing those who dwell in the cities.

But, Mr. President, when you complain at the farmer about the price of his products, remember that they are not held at artificial points by trusts and combinations. Remember that they are not regulated by a tariff, because your tariff on meat and your tariff on wheat only operate on the price within a certain zone. It is precisely like the price of lumber, which so deeply concerns my eloquent friend from Michigan. The Senator from Georgia and I voted against taking the tariff off of lumber because the Government collects, or did collect at that time, more than $3,700,000 under the whole lumber schedule. On the single item of rough lumber the Government collected more than $1,700,000. On rough lumber and shingles the Government collected more than $2,000,000. I was not willing to remit that revenue because we had not been advised that the Government's expenses were to be reduced, and I understood, as the Senator from Georgia understood, that if we remitted the $2,000,000 which the Government then collected on lumber we would be compelled to raise it by a duty on something else; and I preferred to raise it on lumber rather than on something else, because my people did not pay the tax on lumber and they were apt to pay the tax on the substitute.

You could not bring the lumber from Canada to Texas, because the lowest freight rate from the nearest point was more than $8 a thousand. The ordinary freight rate would have reached $12 per thousand. Therefore it was obvious that free lumber would not enable Canadian lumber to reach the markets of Texas or any other Southern State. It would have reduced the price of lumber in Michigan. The Senator from Michigan knew that, and the Senator from Michigan wanted the benefit of that for his people. I credit him with being willing to divide with the Government. He sought to take a dollar away from it and give it to his people.

I want to say to the Senator from Michigan that I am ready to vote a tax of 9 per cent on every article imported into the United States except the absolute necessities of life; and if I could induce you to compromise with me, I would even vote for a duty of double 9 per cent on everything but the necessaries of life. When the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts intimate that the Senator from Georgia was influenced in his vote for $1.50 per thousand on rough lumber they misconceive the position of the Senator from Georgia and the position of the Senator from Texas.

My doctrine is this: If I were framing a protective-tariff bill, I would accord an equal protection to all sections, to all classes, and to all industries. The best of the Republicans claim that they desire to do that, and the wisest of them, who are generally also the best, earnestly strive to do that, because they believe in that doctrine. On the other hand, I am opposed to protection in any form or to any industry, but I recognize that the Government must collect a vast sum of money through the custom-houses, and when I come to lay taxes I do so purely and only for the purpose of collecting that money for the support of the Government; but in collecting it for that purpose I would collect it impartially from all importers, because I believe all importers should be compelled to contribute their fair share toward the support of the Government. In other words, I would lay a duty on wool, but I would no more lay it for the purpose of compelling the woolen manufacturer to pay a higher price to the woolgrower when he bought his wool than I would lay a duty on the woolen goods for the purpose of compelling the consumer to pay more for them when he bought them from the manufacturer. I would lay the duty on wool and I would lay the duty on woolen goods purely and only for the purpose of compelling the importer of each to contribute toward the support of the Government.

I hope the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts will not understand it as a reflection on them when I say that there never was a time in the history of this Government when a man with intelligence enough to be a Senator did not recognize that the most earnest Democrats are compelled to vote for tariff duties in order to raise money to support the Government; and where better could you lay a tariff duty than on lumber, at the rate of 9 per cent, when it raised $1,700,000 toward the public expenses? The same was true of hides. From the 15 per cent duty on hides the Government derived a revenue of more than $3,000,000, $1,000,000 of which you returned to the men who paid it in the shape of drawbacks. But there was a clear net revenue to the Government of more than $2,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. I think it was about $1,800,000.

Mr. BAILEY. It varied.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it varied.

Mr. BAILEY. The highest was more than $2,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is right.

Mr. BAILEY. It has gone as low as $1,600,000 net. Yet you took the duty off of hides, which raised over $2,000,000 annually toward the Government's support, and left a duty on boots and shoes, which raised the pitiful sum of $26,000.

Mr. President, if I might be pardoned for referring to what I said on another occasion, I would be less than human if I did not recall the fact that I warned you then that you could not suppress the trusts by putting their raw material on the free list. You tried it in the case of hides, and what has happened? The great leather manufacturers put together a larger combination, and, with the raw material of the leather trust free, they put up the price of leather from 10 to 15 per cent.

The Senator from Georgia has well and wisely said that in every question of price there are many elements, and it might happen that two elements were operating on the same article in different directions, either neutralizing each other or one counteracting and overcoming the other. We have never taught, and I hope we will always be too wise to teach, that every question of price is settled by the tariff. But this much we do know, and this much I hope we will always have the common sense to maintain, that whenever you make it cost more to import any article into this country, not only will the import duty be added to the price of the article actually imported, but a similar increase will always result in the price of the domestic article itself.

So I have no doubt that the duty on beef, the duty on wheat, the duty on barley, and the duty on rye does affect the price of those articles in a certain zone; and if I had any doubt about it, I would be instructed by my distinguished friend from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who was so eager to protect his people. I make no complaint. I rather speak of it in compliment to him. He was eager to give his people the benefit of that protection within the territory which he has the honor to represent. I have no complaint against any Republican Senator who supports the policy of protection for wanting his people to have its full advantage. But the fact that he was earnest for a duty on those articles is abundant proof that, in his judgment at least, it would make a difference in their price.

Now, one word more and I am through, Mr. President.

The Senator from Michigan did not fully answer the Senator from Georgia when he called attention to the fact that the price of beef was 3½ cents higher in Detroit than it was at Windsor, while the tariff duty was only 1½ cents. That is easily explained. It is because the Americans at Detroit have a better quality of beef than the Canadians have at Windsor. If we should inquire at the Washington market place, I venture to say, that even in this day of high prices, we would find beef ranging from 8 cents to 28 cents, and probably higher than that. The price of the meat is not only determined by the place on the carcass of the animal from which it is taken, but also by the quality of the animal itself. A sirloin steak from a well-fed steer weighing 1,300 pounds will command a better price than a sirloin steak from a steer weighing 1,000 pounds. For fifty years the people of the United States have been exporting their best beef to Great Britain. Go to Kentucky, and there in those splendid blue-grass pastures, where the noble shorthorn is monarch of his field, you will find that the very best are intended for export. So it is in Ohio and Illinois and Indiana; the American farmer prepares his very best for export, because they pay a higher price for them over there than we are willing to pay here. But gradually, I rejoice to say, the American purse, keeping pace with the American appetite, now demands much of our choicest beef for home consumption; and it is the better meat which sells for such a high price.

I want all that to increase. I want the purchasing ability of our people to increase. The only limitation that I would set on the price of cattle, which means so much to the prosperity of the farmer, is that I pray it shall never rise so high that an industrious American mechanic will not be able to buy it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the country is profoundly concerned in the price of food products. I can not conceive that they will find either instruction or consolation in the midst of a wilderness of figures or as the result of thrashing over old straw in this Chamber. We must, I conceive, furnish an adequate cause for existing conditions if we insist that a rational people shall accept the assignment of cause as adequate. The difference in the cost of meat at one point in this country or another or the difference in market price from day to day will not furnish a reason for the conditions confronting us. The conditions are not local, Mr. President. They are world-wide conditions, and largely traceable to the same causes everywhere. The people of Great Britain, with millions of unemployed, are moving toward a protective tariff. Some Senators assign the protective tariff as the cause of our ills.

No, Mr. President; the cause of existing conditions must be traced to broader and deeper and more moving causes. It is a fact well known and everywhere conceded that this country and Great Britain notably have been suffering from an abnormal trend in the movement of population for nearly half a century. Our people have been drawn from the fields of production into the columns of nonproducers, while at the same time continuing to be consumers.

The time was not long ago, a time we all recall, when the farmer was the prolific source of cheap jokes in the theater. In the dime show he was trotted out a whiskered Reuben, a person to be held in a certain degree of contempt.

The young men of the country were impelled to move to the city, and that general impulse existed all over this country. Every boy who could speak a declamation wanted to be a lawyer; every boy who was unable to express himself well was inclined to be a doctor, because he did not have to give a reason in any case.

Mr. President, that movement of people from the farms to the towns has been a great injury to this country. Simultaneously with the movement we witnessed the continual neglect, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has said, of the science of farming. Those who remained upon the farms cultivated the soil in such an inconsiderate and reckless way that the acreage yield continued to decrease on every cultivated acre throughout the country. The wheat-producing properties of the soil of States like Pennsylvania became exhausted. Pennsylvania, once a great wheat State, is no longer noted for wheat production. If all the country east of the Mississippi River should be driven to the necessity of relying on home production for bread, they would be compelled to import from foreign countries.

Shortly after the great fields of England were abandoned or turned over to be game preserves for the wealthy few, the rural population having been drawn or driven into the cities, we began to see the same thing operate in New England. Vast reaches of country once cultivated closely were turned out to grow up in brush and remained neglected. The old homesteads were deserted, to become the rendezvous for bats and owls.

Between here and the city of Baltimore you travel but 40 miles and observe one-half of all the area over which you pass growing up to jack pines—a neglected, desolate-looking region. Go to the south of the Potomac and the same condition exists. Off in the splendid fertile valley of the Sacramento River, on the western coast, where at one time the granaries were bursting every fall with the mighty crops of wheat, you will find the same silence and barrenness we now observe within gunshot of this capital.

The Sacramento was once a great wheat resource for the Pacific coast. Millions of acres of fertile soil have been abandoned, not by the owners, because the taxes are still paid, but the fields are no longer cultivated. The owners are holding them for high prices, no doubt. The same is true in the San Joaquin Valley. These two valleys of matchless fertility are not cultivated to a tenth part of their capacity for production.

Mr. President, if you will take the various occupations that have sprung up, the result of invention and applied science, within the last twenty-five years, you will observe some of the reasons why the boys have drifted to the cities. Within ten years an army of men have engaged in the manufacturing of automobiles and the running of them, larger than the combined armies at Waterloo. In the management of electrical appliances, things that were new twenty-five years ago, employment is given to large numbers who eat meat and bread and produce neither. Can we remedy that by an act of Congress? Will the adjustment of a tariff duty here or there produce an adequate reply to the people in the way of substantial result?

I rather think, Mr. President, that we are dependent upon laws that have never been enacted and can never be repealed for a solution of this question. The trolley car, the telephone, the scientific man in the agricultural school will first make country life desirable by destroying the isolation which used to be so unendurable on the farm, and thus make the business of farming more interesting and more profitable.

It has become the fashion to have a country place. It has become a matter of business to conduct a farm. Hundreds and thousands of university graduates are engaging in farming enterprises in our great West to-day. In my humble judgment, the encouragement of thrifty farming, the scientific treatment of the soil, and the settlement of our millions of home seekers upon the public domain will do much to aid in solving the vexatious problem of the hour.

Great Britain is recognizing the force of this suggested course, because arrangements are being made there now looking to the division or subdivision of the vast land holdings upon which a contented people once abided. In California I visited a ranch last summer, embracing an area of over 500 acres—one place in the San Joaquin Valley. It was all level, fertile land, embraced in what is known as the "Tevis ranch."

It has heretofore been managed by one individual, a man of great strength of character and superior intelligence. He has made some, but very little, profit out of the transaction. As a consequence of the failure to obtain remunerative or reasonable yield on the investment, that great ranch is being cut up into small holdings as rapidly as the process can be economically carried forward.

Mr. President, I would suggest that when the Senators from South Dakota here yesterday presented a bill which provides for the opening up of millions of acres of public lands to actual settlers, they offered their contribution toward the solution of this problem.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. I largely agree with what the Senator from Montana has said, but there is a point from which I am not able exactly to follow him. I think myself that a movement back to the farm from the city would be much to the advantage of the country, but——

Mr. CARTER. And the cities as well.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). Can you expect that to happen as long as the country boy can go to the city and receive the present industrial wage, which is so much larger than he has heretofore received for farm work, unless you leave the price of farm products high enough to compensate him at something like the same rate he receives in the town or city?

My view is this, that if the price of farm products can remain at something like a fair level with the price of manufactured products, then undoubtedly the boy reared on the farm is inclined to remain there; but if he must take $20 a month to help raise horses, and he can get $60 a month for helping to manufacture automobiles, I am rather inclined to think the trend will continue toward the city. If it should happen that the reclamation of these vast areas solves what is called a problem—I do not call it a problem, for I do not think foodstuffs are at any higher level than other commodities at this time, although they are higher than was the case several years ago—but if you can place all these vast areas under cultivation and thus reduce the price of food products back to a comfortable level for the dwellers in the cities, then you will stimulate another exodus from the country to the city.

The Senator alluded a moment ago to the vast army of men that are engaged in automobile manufacturing. Mr. President, if it had not been for electricity, the cable, and the automobile, the farmer would to-day receive $400 for a horse for which he is now glad to get $200. The difference in that price has been saved to the city and lost to the farm.

I believe in the farmer. I believe that when we touch our mother earth we not only renew our strength, but also our patriotism, and I would rather see a happy rural population, though it should not be so rich, than any other condition that could come to pass. But the very circumstance to which the Senator alludes, that of bringing under cultivation these vast areas—and I know what he has in mind; he is going to bring them in by irrigation. But if you reclaim those lands, until you restore the former level of agricultural prices, you would simply restore the old condition of the population going from the country into the town. In other words, as every Senator here from the cotton States knows, it was easy to induce the farmer's boy to leave the farm and go to town when cotton was 5 and 6 and 7 cents a pound, but it is practically impossible to take him away from the farm when cotton is 10 to 15 cents a pound. That is the condition that we confront, in my opinion.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, unquestionably the commercial feature of the problem—and I think it is a problem—will always have a controlling influence to a great extent. It would take many years' continuance of the movement to reestablish proper proportions between the rural and city population of this country. I do think that in the last ten years that movement has been constantly gaining momentum.

Mr. BAILEY. From the city back to the country?

Mr. CARTER. From the city back to the country.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not now recall a dozen cases where men have gone from the city back to the country.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, one good which has resulted recently is that, in some degree, the movement from the country to the city has been arrested, but there has been no important movement from the city back to the country.

Mr. CARTER. I doubt if at any time in the history of this country there has been such a keen appetite for land or farms as exists to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator, of his own personal knowledge—because what would be true of one Senator would be true of others—recall any number of people that have gone from the city to the farm?

Mr. CARTER. I know in my home town, which is a place of about 20,000 people, quite a number have quit merchandising and other occupations—including persons who were day laborers and miners—and have gone out to take up farms. It has become quite a popular movement in our section of the country. Every train moving westward to-day during the season when the climatic conditions favor will be found very heavily laden with persons westward bound in quest of homes. Every time we advertise one of the Indian reservations for opening it is observed that people from all over the country, from the cities as well as the country places, appear as seekers for homes.

Now, one instance. Last summer the Irrigation Committee visited a reclamation project in the West, and some of the people were complaining of the quantity of the crop raised that year. An old-timer said, "Well, what can be expected of these people? They must be instructed in the art of farming before they can farm. They think that anybody can farm; they think that ignorance is just as effective as intelligence in this kind of business." He pointed out a man in a crowd standing about—for we were going to hold a public meeting, and this was preliminary to it—and said, "That man over there is a jack-leg lawyer from Baltimore, Md."

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps he could not do anything well.

Mr. CARTER. The old-timer continued: "He has come out here to farm. There is a fellow who was formerly a shoemaker. How can he come out here, irrigate land, and raise a good crop the first year?" It seemed to me he pointed out in that small crowd at least half the membership as persons who had been engaged in some other occupation or in some trade or profession. This seemed to indicate a movement toward the farm from the cities.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. It does not encourage me very much to know that men who have failed in all other pursuits are going back to the country. What I want to do is to take back somebody that is competent to cultivate his fields as the Senator and I agree they must be cultivated. What I hope to do, and all I hope to do, is to arrest that process of elimination to which the Senator referred a while ago, that sends so many of the brightest boys to town to practice law and practice medicine. A good farmer is happier and makes a better citizen than a lawyer without clients or a doctor without patients.

I do not hail the day that the "jack-leg lawyers," as the Senator calls them, will go to the farms. If good lawyers will go there, that will help immensely. If lawyers like the Senator from Montana, when he completes his service here, which I hope will be a long time off, unless we can replace him with a Democrat [laughter], will go to the farm, he will help solve the question, but jack-leg lawyers will never do it in the world.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Texas for the compliment. I know that he is now a farmer in good standing in both Texas and Kentucky. I have heard the Texas people speak of him as a farmer rather than as an agriculturist.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I am not a farmer; I am an agriculturist. The Senator knows the difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. I was informed in Texas that the Senator was known down there as a practical farmer, that he was so regarded by the voters of the State, and that the farmers would stand by him in all future elections.

Mr. BAILEY. They do, but for other and sufficient reasons. I will say, however, Mr. President, that it is among the chief sources of delight for me to recall that I have done something to help improve the methods of farming and the quality of live stock. I have not always received a financial reward, because, as I said a moment ago, I have been an agriculturist instead of a farmer, the difference being, as I understand it, that the farm supports the farmer and the agriculturist supports the farm. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the movement toward the farm has set in and that it will continue for a long time to come. I do know that it has become popular to be a farmer. I do know that the isolation of farm life has been largely banished by the telephone, the trolley cars, the automobile, and the steam railway.

In the early Revolutionary days the Senator will recall that in the South no gentleman lived in town. They lived on plantations. Those plantations are now very largely abandoned. That is in pursuance of the general movement which led people into the cities. I think the tide has turned in that behalf, and, I believe, as the normal relation between the urban and rural population is reestablished, that the great difficulty connected with the occasional abnormal price of food will be eliminated by a constant course of uninterrupted production.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, before the Senator resumes his seat, I want to remind him, not for the purpose of differing with him, that the condition which existed in the South, to which he refers—and it did exist as he describes it—seems to establish that the isolation of the farmer was no disadvantage to him. There never lived in this or in any other country since the world began a higher class of men than those southern planters of whom we know so much, and yet their plantations were far removed from each other; their access to the city was not easy; they spent most of their time at home; but they did not misspend any part of it while there. Their books and trying to improve their estate was their chief occupation; and in that case the isolation of the planter did not reduce his intelligence. Yet I am inclined to agree with the Senator that for the great average of the world, contact is the best. The race of farmers that made the plantations of the South so famous before the war might have lived more alone, but, if alone, it was only in one sense. They might have had no company, but they always had good books and high thoughts.

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct in that behalf.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BANKHEAD, at his own request, was, on motion of Mr. MONEY, excused from further service upon the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MONEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. HUGHES be appointed to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Public Lands.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 31, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several preceding bills were passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, the country is not yet done with the tariff question. Last year Congress met and passed a tariff bill after a campaign in which all parties had promised a downward revision of the tariff to the people. How well Congress kept that promise is clearly shown by one conclusive fact, namely, that every ship on the ocean bound from foreign ports to ours crowded all sail and steam in order to reach our ports and have entry made before the new law adopted by the last Congress should go into operation, so as to escape, if possible, the higher duties levied under the new law than were levied under the old one.

Somebody deceived the people and the people know it. I wish to read what was said by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CHAMP CLARK, at Kansas City on the 9th of this month. It is as follows:

> The people asked for bread, and the ALDRICH-CANNON crowd gave them a stone. They asked for a fish, and were requested to regale themselves with a serpent.
> In the congressional campaign of 1910 the overshadowing question will be whether public men are under any sort of obligation to tell the truth, and unless the public conscience is absolutely dead—which I do not believe—the Republicans will receive the bloodiest licking they have had since 1890. Are ante-election promises things to be depended upon and lived up to, or are they merely tricks with which to deceive the unwary, enticing baits with which to catch gudgeons? If the latter, then politics has fallen to a low estate and a contemptible condition.

Mr. Chairman, in September of last year Mr. W. J. Bryan made, in Dallas, Tex., a speech concerning the binding force of platform promises and pledges and giving forth his views on Democratic doctrines and teachings as to the tariff. At a later date the junior Senator from Texas replied to that speech. On the 18th day of October of the same year I was requested by citizens of the city of Cameron, in my district, to make for them a speech discussing the issues raised by the speech of Mr. Bryan and the reply of the junior Senator from Texas. That speech has been circulated within my State, and for its wider circulation, because I believe the questions discussed are Nation-wide in importance and interest, I wish to extend my remarks by including it in the RECORD by the consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. Hardy's remarks were withdrawn by consent of the House.]

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, obedient to a memorial that was sent to the Representatives in Congress from the State of Mississippi, I hold in my hands a resolution passed in December last by an organization of citizens of my State, numbering more than 30,000 of as progressive, patriotic men as inhabit any portion of the Republic, the Farmers' Co-operative and Educational Union of Mississippi.

Unknown to gentlemen, possibly, on this side and on the other, that section of our country has been visited by a scourge the extent of which can not be realized in the fullness thereof by those who have not been brought in contact with it. To the casual observer the importance of the cotton crop in America, economically considered, is a question not local. It is a question governmental in its importance. It enters into our commercial relationship with all nations of the earth.

A few days since it was my privilege to read an address that was submitted by Doctor Knapp, of the farmers' cooperative demonstration work. He has made a tour of that section of the country in which that fabric is the chief item in our agricultural economy.

He states clearly, as was suggested by my colleague from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE], that the pace of production has not more than, if quite, kept up with that of consumption, and that remark of his is emphasized by the pronouncement of the Secretary of Agriculture in his annual statement, that the value of that crop is second in importance only to corn in America's agriculture, reaching in value $850,000,000; almost, if not quite, equaling, at net prices now obtained, which were somewhat less when that statement was made, the budget of expenses of this great Government.

A threat is held over that great industry, Mr. Chairman; a threat that comes from an insidious and at present little understood foe, a little mite, known as the "boll weevil," which some fifteen years ago crossed the Rio Grande from the Mexican Republic. We heard of it with the skeptical ear that belongs to all humanity, and we postponed for years the day of evil with that hope which is also characteristic of humanity, that destruction would be averted. I need not recite on the floor of the House my individual experience with this vicious trouble, but I will make one concrete statement. When I returned last session to my home I there met for the first time the condition that obtains in that section as a result of this ravage. I was so astonished and appalled that I immediately telegraphed to the department to send two or more of the best experts that it had and put them at my command.

In my own county, one of the greatest producing points of this staple, this crop fell from 27,000 bales of production in normal times and conditions to 4,271 bales of cotton. In the five counties which border the Mississippi on the west of my district we have, in eighteen months' experience of that trouble and pest, lost in the aggregate 69,582 bales of cotton, representing $5,538,560.

Now, can we combat this pest, is the question. Until we have passed through the crucible of test it awaits to be seen. I ask to have this resolution read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Farmers' Union of Mississippi on December 2, 1909:

"Whereas the work of teaching the farmers to be prosperous in spite of the boll weevil has been found to be a great benefit to all interests wherever it has been carried on; and

"Whereas it has been clearly demonstrated that with the present appropriations made by Congress, the progress of the work can not keep pace with the great demand for it: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Farmers' Union of the State of Mississippi in convention assembled urgently requests the Members of Congress from this State to use every honorable means to secure an appropriation of at least $500,000 to be used by Dr. S. A. Knapp, who has charge of the farmers' cooperative demonstration work in the South."

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the resolution just read is the formal expression of the will and wish of those who send it. This is the expressed desire of more than 30,000 farmers of my State, through their representatives, who, in state convention at the city of Jackson last December, passed these resolutions, constituting this memorial to the Representatives from Mississippi in this body. While, Mr. Chairman, these figures may suggest, in the minds of those unacquainted with the local conditions which compelled this action, the idea of extravagance—when contrasted with the amount proposed in this bill, $215,155—yet when this amount by them sought is compared with the value of the great industry to be sustained and protected, the contrast is indeed in the reverse astounding. This body of men, members of the Farmers' Union, composed of as patriotic and intelligent citizens as live, numbering its membership by more than 3,000,000, has asked no unreasonable or extravagant sum.

To him who has not carefully watched the progress of that great menace to cotton, the boll weevil, in its progress eastward across the States of the South the importance of this appropriation and the absolute need therefor is an impossible conception. Very few can, Mr. Chairman, appreciate the unique position of the 11—or 12 if we speak of those fractional parts—American States in the production of cotton. Stated by Mr. Secretary Wilson in his last annual report, it ranks second in importance and value in our entire agricultural economy. Figuring upon a basis of 13.07 cents per pound on November 1, and $25 per ton for the seed, it stands valued by this distinguished official at $850,000,000.

By reason of market enhancement subsequently of both items, this amount is subject to estimation at a figure near or quite $925,000,000, an amount approximating the entire cost of the conduct of the Government in all its departments. We are to-day producing, according to statistics, 66.4 per cent of the entire world's production. England, with all the commercial prowess characteristic of her people, with lands in every quarter of the globe, with India's plains, with the valley of the Nile, fabulous in fertility, and an inexhaustible treasury upon which to draw, has as yet succeeded in producing only 21.4 per cent of the world's supply. Russia, with the incentive of industrial necessity, actuated by imperial power, and a treasury practically limitless upon which to draw, with her field of operations extending from the Arctic Circle to the city of St. Petersburg and to Manchuria, has exacted of earth, in obedience to these efforts, 4.3 per cent. All other lands have as signally failed.

But the supremacy of America is threatened, and this, her greatest—to use the words of one of the highest knowledge, Doctor Knapp—cash crop, her greatest medium in producing the credit balance in international trade in our favor, is menaced in its very existence. From statistics we learn that the progress in American production has been along lines approximating double the yield in every twenty-two years. For instance, beginning with 1816, we find the production periods of bales of 500 pounds weight:

	Number of bales.
1816	259,416
1838	1,092,980
1860	3,841,416
1886 (not counting civil war period, four years)	6,314,561
1908	13,587,306

Thus we note that the crop approximately doubles every twenty-two years. At this rate, in 1930, if the ratio is sustained, we may expect 27,174,612 bales, and in 1952, 54,349,224 bales produced. If, as in the past, the needs of civilization keep pace with our productive power, this will be required. But turn to production, and what do we find promised by figures now at hand? Taking Louisiana, we have produced in 1909, 251,643 bales of cotton; 1907, 662,543, leaving 410,900 bales deficit, at $80 per bale, a loss of $32,872,000.

Again, the same State produced in 1909, 251,643 bales; 1906, 955,473 bales, leaving 703,830 bales of cotton deficit, or, at $80 per bale, $56,306,400 loss to that State since 1906.

In my own State, I name the five counties furnished by the Census Bureau where the weevil has appeared for one and two years:

County.	1909.	1907.	Deficit.	Per bale.	Loss.
	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.
Adams	1,592	15,467	13,875	$80	$1,110,000
Claiborne	6,893	24,183	15,290	80	1,223,200
Amite	13,612	25,568	11,956	80	956,480
Franklin	5,421	15,045	9,624	80	769,920
Wilkinson	4,271	23,128	18,857	80	1,508,560
Total	33,789	103,391	69,602		5,568,160

This admonishes us that we have sustained a loss of 67.2 per cent. Reasoning on this basis, the States of Alabama, South Carolina, Georgia, Arkansas, Mississippi, and North Carolina, which by the last census report had produced 6,203,918 bales, when infested, as we have been, will sustain a loss of 3,811,416 bales, or $304,917,280.

Taking the crop of 1908, which was 13,086,005 bales, and deducting 8,793,795 bales, which is 67.2 per cent, we have 4,292,210 bales as the yield thus proportioned on two years' experience.

There are, we are told, 18,042,245,000 pounds of textile material, of which cotton is 9,787,000,000 pounds; of this, 6,500,000,000 pounds is the product of the United States. In other words, cotton constitutes 54 per cent of the textile supply of the world, and 66.4 per cent thereof is produced by us. Ten million people are directly engaged in its production on our shores, and its influence touches at least 30,000,000 Americans in their commercial, industrial, and financial life. Its influence girdles the globe, and its fleecy thread binds all nations to us in international mutuality of interest.

I make, Mr. Chairman, no partisan appeal. I call especially on no Democrat, no Republican, but I, as an American, direct this appeal to Americans, representing Americans and the world. Closely clinging to this great enterprise is every interest upon this continent. The farmer, the merchant, the spinner, the manufacturer, the transportation master on land and sea, are all, by its fleecy fiber, bound in indissoluble union.

Its value is expressed in every mart in the language suggestive of value by the coinage of all nations. Wherever civilization has sealed with its signet the progress of man, its fleecy covering shields and adorns the human race. With the earnestness of my nature, I appeal to you for the aid I seek, and I admonish you, here and now, that by your action to-day you will give to these people a new lease of industrial life; you will send them a message of hope, or you will record the epitaph of America's imperial agricultural industry. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Reserving the balance of the time on this side, I will ask the chairman of the committee to please use some of his time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, so far as I know there will be but one other speech on this side, and that will be the chairman's report on the bill; and, of course, I prefer that should be just before we take up the bill for consideration under the five-minute rule. I therefore ask the gentleman from Virginia to consume all of his time.

Mr. LAMB. I will yield back the time, and we can go on with the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department, which the House has been considering in spots for the past two or three days, is unique in the fact that it is almost identical with the estimates submitted by the Secretary; and the estimates are unique in the respect that they are substantially a copy of the existing law. There is no new legislation of importance. There is no change of language which alters in any way the scope or character of the work the department is doing; and in only three of the bureaus are there changes in the sums appropriated sufficient in amount to call for special comment.

The most important of these changes is in the Forest Service, where there is an increase of $497,500, made necessary, in the judgment of the committee, by the addition to the national forests since the present appropriation bill was enacted of new reservations aggregating 26,500,000 acres.

In the Bureau of Plant Industry $25,000 has been added to enable the Secretary to meet the anticipated demand for sets of cotton samples that will be used as standards for the new grades which the department has established under the authority of the act of 1908.

In the Weather Bureau $15,000 has been added in order that the station at Sand Key, Florida, which was swept away by the hurricane of October last, may be rebuilt.

There has been a considerable number of minor changes in the various paragraphs of the respective bureaus, made necessary by transfers of employees from lump sums to statutory rolls and by the shifting requirements of the different lines of work. But with the three exceptions to which I have just called attention, those increases do not involve an addition to the total appropriation. The bill, therefore, carries an aggregate of $13,417,136, as against $12,995,036 carried in the existing law, a net increase of $422,100.

The committee realizes, Mr. Chairman, that in presenting a bill which is so nearly a duplicate of the existing law it is likely to incur criticism of those on the one hand who believe that more generous provision should be made for carrying forward the tremendously important work of this great department, and of those on the other hand who will argue that the conditions of the Treasury demand retrenchment in this as in all other departments of the Government. To a degree, at least, the committee is willing to let one of those criticisms answer the other, on the theory that all important legislation is to a greater or less extent a compromise of conflicting interests and opinions.

But by way of more specific answer, first to the criticism that the bill is not sufficiently generous, there are several considerations to which we beg to call attention.

The first of these, of course, is the necessity we all recognize for economy in public expenditures. The deficit in the Treasury, which has been staring us in the face for nearly three years and has now reached a distressingly large amount, must certainly admonish every Member of Congress of his duty to limit appropriations to as low a figure as is consistent with efficient administration. It was, no doubt, a realization of the necessity for this economy, and a recognition of his own responsibility in relation to it, that prompted the Secretary of Agriculture in submitting these estimates to ask substantially for no increase over the allowances carried in the present law; and your committee did not feel warranted in increasing the estimates, believing that if the public exigency had demanded it he would not have failed to ask for additional sums.

But there is another consideration which had weight with the committee, and that is the rapid growth of the Department of Agriculture, as shown by the increase of appropriations during the past decade. The appropriations for that department for each of the past ten fiscal years were as follows:

Appropriations for Department of Agriculture.

Fiscal year ending—
June 30, 1900	$3,726,022
June 30, 1901	4,023,500
June 30, 1902	4,582,420
June 30, 1903	5,208,960
June 30, 1904	5,978,160
June 30, 1905	5,902,040
June 30, 1906	6,882,690
June 30, 1907	9,930,440
June 30, 1908	9,447,290
June 30, 1909	11,627,106
June 30, 1910	12,995,036

It will thus be seen that the growth of the appropriations for this department during the past ten years has been nearly 400 per cent, a showing which will certainly acquit the committee and the Congress of having treated the Department of Agriculture in a niggardly or parsimonious fashion. Indeed it has been a serious question in the minds of a good many who have given the matter careful consideration whether the expansion in this department has not been more rapid than was consistent with efficient and economic administration. As evidence that this opinion is not entirely without foundation, I quote from the statement of Dr. B. T. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, who, as gentlemen know, is one of the most accomplished and capable men in the department. Doctor Galloway appeared before the Committee on Agriculture to explain his estimates, and when asked whether he had made an estimate for any increases, he replied:

> No. In fact, we are of the opinion that with our present funds and with the gradual effort we are making to readjust our work from time to time, that we are better off just as we are. That is, we believe that it is a good thing once in a while to stop and take stock, as it were, and develop things specifically, so that we will be in better condition to meet exigencies as they may arise.
> We have been growing quite rapidly. The whole department has been growing, thanks to this committee, and, so far as this bureau is concerned, we believe that the present estimates are sufficient to enable us to do all the work that it is necessary to do, and by readjusting certain projects we can meet exigencies as they may happen to arise.

With testimony such as that, Mr. Chairman, from so competent a witness, the committee feels that the charge of undue economy can not lie against it.

But there is still another reason, in the judgment of the committee, why an increase in the amounts carried in this bill at the present time may not be so necessary as similar or even greater increases may have appeared to be in former years. That is that the state agricultural colleges and experiment stations are enlarging their field and increasing their efficiency to such an extent that a great many problems and conditions which formerly were referred to the department here at Washington may now be handled through local agencies. The committee has always been disposed to place the most liberal construction upon the very broad language of the act creating the Department of Agriculture, and has never attempted to restrict its activities to what might be regarded as purely national or interstate problems. Yet, we have realized that it would be impossible, even if it were desirable, which we do not think it is, to build up here at Washington a department great enough to do all the work—research, experimentation, and demonstration, scientific and practical—that needs to be done for the promotion of agriculture throughout the United States.

And therefore we have always encouraged the officials of the department to cooperate, whenever possible, with the state authorities, and to leave entirely with them such problems as their equipment in men and means enabled them to meet. There is room enough in this illimitable field for every agency, state and federal, and the more closely and cordially they cooperate with one another the more completely each one meets the demands in its own peculiar constituency, the stronger each one will become, and the greater will be the service, which all of them, taken together, can render the country.

It is very natural, of course, that the States should shift to the General Government such burdens as it seems willing to bear, because, however jealous the people may be of the rights of their States, they are not apt to worry very much about their duties or responsibilities. But natural as this policy may be, it is most shortsighted and unwise, particularly in regard to matters relating to agriculture, and most of the States, I think, are beginning to realize it.

Year by year the state institutions are receiving more generous support and are becoming better able to meet the needs and demands of their own constituents, and as this ability increases the department at Washington will be more and more at liberty to withdraw from purely local fields and concentrate its attention upon the problems which are truly national in scope, or are of such magnitude as to be beyond the reach of local institutions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question at his own convenience.

Mr. SCOTT. It would perhaps make my statement a little more connected and coherent if the gentleman would wait until I have finished the statement I have it in mind to make.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am quite willing to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. This condition of self-reliance on the part of the States and consequent freedom on the part of the department at Washington to devote its attention to the big problems, which all must concede to be desirable, would be retarded, we believe, rather than promoted by too liberal grants to the department. We are willing to appropriate liberally in order to help others to help themselves, but it would be mistaken generosity and would weaken the state institutions to continue indefinitely to do through federal agencies work which these institutions are able to do, and in the absence of federal aid would do themselves.

In the long run it would defeat the very object which it is sought to gain, and we believe it is in the interest of agriculture in the broadest sense to throw upon the States all the burdens of local work which their means will enable them to carry.

So much in answer to the anticipated criticism that the committee has not been sufficiently liberal in the sums recommended in this bill.

To those, on the other hand, who are disposed to take the opposite view and to hold that the committee has been more liberal than the condition of the Treasury warrants, we beg to suggest that the character of the Department of Agriculture, the scope and nature of the work it does, differentiates it so completely from the other departments of the Government that different treatment of it may well be justified.

All the other governmental departments have certain fixed charges which must, of course, be met; but nearly all of them are doing additional outside work which may be postponed for a year, or two or three years, without serious detriment to the public service. The Department of Agriculture, on the other hand, bears a relation to the chief industry of our people so direct and vital that to withdraw from any field which it now occupies for so long a time as a year would inflict a money loss upon our people immeasurably greater in the aggregate than the small sum which the most rigid economist would argue should be deducted from this bill.

The statistics of our exports, as well as the continually increasing prices which are just now the subject of so much comment, show that our home consumption of farm products is rapidly overtaking production. With the exception of the limited areas that may be brought under cultivation by the extension of dry farming and the development of irrigation our acreage of farm land can not be increased. The conclusion follows that if the demand of our rapidly growing population for food products is to be met without importation from abroad it must be by increasing our crop yield.

It is precisely to this problem that the energies of the Department of Agriculture are directed. It is the only federal agency that is thus engaged, and it is doing its work with marked and almost spectacular success. The warnings that are sent out by the Weather Bureau which enable our farmers and fruit growers in large measure to protect their crops and fruits from frost and flood, the activity of the Bureau of Animal Industry in safeguarding the health of our domestic animals, the contributions of the Bureau of Plant Industry in the way of new seeds and plants and the development of better methods of agriculture, the instruction of the Bureau of Entomology, whereby the ravages of injurious insects are so largely minimized, the thousand and one activities of the department, all contribute so directly to the output of our gardens and orchards and fields that every dollar thus expended multiplies itself manyfold in the national balance sheet. To withhold any reasonable sum which could be effectively and judiciously expended in this work would therefore be extravagance and not economy.

It is these considerations, Mr. Chairman, having regard on the one hand to the necessity for drawing as lightly as possible upon the public funds, and not forgetting on the other the very great money value of the work the department is doing, that have influenced your committee in its judgment, and we trust the recommendations we have made will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one hour and ten minutes remaining.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy part of that time, not in discussing further the details of the bill, deferring that, with the consent of the committee, until we take the bill up under the five-minute rule, but in referring briefly to some of the more interesting features of the work of the department during the past year. This work has proceeded along the usual lines and with the usual success.

In the line of its regular activity, the most striking accomplishment, perhaps, of the Weather Bureau was the prediction of the terrific hurricane which swept over Florida and other portions of the Gulf coast last October. I have before me a letter from an official of the Florida East Coast Railway Company, which is building an extension from Jacksonville, Fla., almost all the way out to Key West, in which he sends his thanks to the chief of the bureau for the timely warning that was given, by means of which he was enabled to withdraw the men who were at work on that extension from their dangerous position, resulting, as he believed, in saving the lives of not less than 3,000 men.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman remember how long that warning was given?

Mr. SCOTT. The warning was sent out some twelve hours in advance of the height of the storm.

In a purely scientific way the most interesting work of the Weather Bureau has been in connection with the exploration of the upper air. This was done by means of kites flown from the station at Mount Weather, in Virginia, and by means of balloons that were sent, equipped with automatically registering instruments, from various parts of the country. The kites attained an elevation of from 1 to 4½ miles every day, and the observations thus obtained have been found very useful in forecasting the weather for this section of the United States. The records secured by the balloons seem to have established the fact, which Professor Moore regards as "the most wonderful thing in meteorology," that after a certain altitude is reached there is an actual gain in temperature instead of a gradual loss. It has been the theory of scientists always that the temperature gradually lowered as we ascended from the earth, until among the interstellar spaces it faded away entirely, and we reached what is called "absolute zero;" but these balloons, which attained the astounding height of 16 to 18 miles, seem to have demonstrated a different condition to exist. Commenting upon this singular fact, Professor Moore said:

All our physics and our mechanics of the air have been based on the assumption that the temperature gradually decreases with elevation until in outer space there is no temperature. We sent up balloons from Omaha and Indianapolis to above the storm strata, which is about 6 miles deep, the upper limit of which in summer rises and in winter falls. From the equator it falls toward the poles. There, then, is what we call the "storm stratum" below 6 miles depth, on the average. It rises and falls with the seasons. From the surface of the ground up the temperature gradually falls from a normal temperature of 50 above zero to a normal temperature of 50 below zero at 6 miles. Now, then, by sending up these balloons we find that from the moment you pass above this storm stratum, from that up to an altitude of 16 and sometimes 18 miles, instead of the temperature continuing to fall it actually slightly rises. There is a positive gain, and the observations have been so long continued as to leave no shadow of doubt of the fact that above the storm stratum there is a new world, an entirely different condition of atmosphere, a second atmosphere floating upon the storm element, like oil floating upon water. And this upper air has an easterly velocity of only one-half of what the lower air has. Heretofore we have assumed that the higher you go the swifter is the easterly velocity, but the lower air runs eastward at a velocity of from 80 to 100 miles an hour, while up here in this upper stratum only about half as fast does it go eastward; and we call it the isothermal stratum—that is, the equal-heated stratum—because from the storm stratum upward there is no fall in temperature, but a slight rise, and the rise is so slight that we call it an equal-heated stratum.

The Bureau of Animal Industry reports very gratifying progress in the work of tick eradication, which has been in progress for three years in the Southern States. Up to date 80,602 square miles have been released from quarantine in the following States:

In Virginia, 9,778 square miles; North Carolina, 10,199; South Carolina, 2,673; Tennessee, 9,849; Kentucky, 841; Arkansas, 5,323; Oklahoma, 4,752; Texas, 1,480; California, 35,706.

It is expected that in the early summer 40,501 square miles more will be released, making in all 120,000 square miles that will have been freed from this dangerous pest. Similar progress has been made in clearing the western ranges from sheep and cattle scab. Within the past year the two Dakotas, Kansas, Nebraska, and Montana were released from quarantine for sheep scab, and quite large areas in Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Nebraska, and North Dakota have been freed from cattle scab. Considerable work has been done in examining dairy herds to ascertain the prevalence of tuberculosis, and the bureau is exerting a very wholesome influence toward its eradication.

The importance of the work that has been done in the Western States in eradicating the cattle and sheep scab and freeing so many States from quarantine on account of those diseases will be realized when the committee remembers that for several years this bureau has been expending about $300,000 to $325,000 annually in that work.

In the Bureau of Plant Industry some work which the chief of the bureau, Doctor Galloway, described as "epoch making" has been done in the way of controlling plant diseases. After fifteen or twenty years of the study of plant pathology, some new fungicides or sprays have been hit upon which seem to promise absolute control of certain fruit diseases, which have heretofore baffled the efforts of all the scientists and have inflicted heavy losses upon the growers. This discovery alone will be worth to the orchardists of the country every year many times the entire cost of maintaining the bureau.

The work of the bureau in combating the cotton boll weevil, for which large appropriations have been made for several years past, is reported to be progressing with very favorable results. In Texas, where the work was first begun, the methods developed by the bureau have proven so successful and have been so generally adopted that there does not seem to be much further need for government assistance. During the current year, therefore, the efforts of the bureau have been confined chiefly to Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia. In these States, particularly in Louisiana, climatic and other conditions are so different from those prevailing in Texas that the methods which proved successful in the latter State have been found to accomplish but limited results. In Texas the people have been shown how to grow cotton in spite of the weevil. In the other States named this has not yet been accomplished, and it is doubtful if it ever can be, except in limited areas, unless parasites of the weevil can be introduced and multiplied in such numbers as to hold them in check. There seems to be a reasonable hope that this may eventually be reached, for the Bureau of Entomology, which is studying this side of the problem, reports that nearly 40 different varieties of parasites have been introduced, and in some sections it is estimated that they caused a mortality of about 50 per cent. For the present, however, the most useful work in the eastern cotton States seems to be the demonstration farm work of the Bureau of Plant Industry, by which the people are being shown that by diversifying their crops they can make a living without raising cotton.

In this connection it will doubtless be of interest to Members of the House to know that the work of establishing standard grades of cotton, authorized by the Burleson amendment to the act of 1908, has been completed. By the terms of this act the Secretary of Agriculture was directed to fix standards for the nine grades of cotton, as follows: Middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict good ordinary, and good ordinary. After careful study of the subject, the Secretary decided to call to his assistance a committee of gentlemen representing all the elements of the cotton trade—the growers, the ginners, the commission merchants, and the spinners—and this committee as finally constituted was composed as follows:

Mr. Joseph A. Airey, of John M. Parker & Co., New Orleans, La.; Mr. James Akers, of Inman, Akers & Inman, Atlanta, Ga.; Mr. F. M. Crump, of F. M. Crump & Co., Memphis, Tenn.; Mr. C. P. Baker, of the Lawrence Manufacturing Company, Boston, Mass.; Mr. Lewis W. Parker, of the Olympia Mills, Greenville, S. C.; Mr. John Martin, Paris, Tex.; Mr. Nathaniel Thayer, of Barry, Thayer & Co., Boston, Mass.; Mr. George W. Neville, of Weld & Neville, New York City; Mr. Charles A. Vedder, of John D. Rogers & Co., Galveston, Tex.; and Dr. M. A. Cobb and Mr. R. L. Bennett, of the Department of Agriculture. The committee was assisted by the following expert cotton classifiers: Mr. W. P. Barbot, of the classification committee, New York Cotton Exchange; Mr. Jules Mazerat, chairman classification committee, New Orleans Cotton Exchange; and Mr. J. R. Taylor, with the firm of Wolf & Co., Dallas, Tex.

All of these gentlemen served without compensation except their actual expenses, and the country is indebted to them for their unselfish labors. As a result of their deliberations a number of sets of samples were made up, some specimens of which are exhibited on the table in front of the Clerk's desk. The boxes shown here represent the extreme grades—the highest and the lowest—a complete set of samples, including a box for each grade named in the law. The samples have not yet been given out to the public, for the reason that the work was not completed until the cotton crop of 1909 had already begun to move, but it is the intention of the Secretary to promulgate them on September 1 next. The law provides that these sets of samples shall be made up in the department and shall be sold at actual cost. Enough money is now available to provide about 175 sets, but indications are that at least 1,000 additional sets will be called for, and it is to meet the expenses of having them made up that the Secretary asked, and the committee has recommended, an increase of $25,000 in the appropriation, to which I called attention in my opening remarks. As gentlemen doubtless know, there is now a great diversity of grades in the different cotton markets of the country, ranging in number from 18 to 60. It is the opinion of men in all branches of the cotton trade that when these standards are issued they will be universally accepted, probably by foreign exchanges as well as our own, to the very great advantage of the cotton industry.

The small box in front of the larger three illustrates the size of the commercial samples which have heretofore been and are at the present time being used in the cotton business. The samples in the large boxes are those that have been prepared by the department and by the committee of experts, whose names I have just read. In the full set there is one box showing a sample for each of the nine grades provided in the law. The samples which appear in the boxes on the table represent the highest grade, the lowest grade, and the middling cotton. Gentlemen will notice there are photographs of the packages on the lids of the boxes. Those photographs are made so that in case the cotton should discolor or there should be trash accidentally thrown over it in the course of use the change would be detected by comparison with the photographs. The law provides that those sets of samples may be supplied by the department at actual cost to anyone who desires to purchase them. The Secretary told us that the demands upon him at the present time indicated that not less than a thousand sets would be called for during the year, and it is to enable him to procure these sets that the committee has asked for an increase of $25,000 in the appropriation.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. In a moment. The law also provides, as gentlemen may not remember, that those purchasing the samples shall pay the actual cost, so that the money will be returned into the Treasury; but, of course, it must be first appropriated in order to have the sets prepared. Now I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What does a set of these cost?

Mr. SCOTT. As nearly as the experts in the department can figure out, a set, which is one of 175 sets, costs $35. They believe that if they started to make up a thousand sets they could reduce the cost to $25 a set.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. How does the farmer get any particular benefit of that if it is going to cost him $25 to get hold of a set to find out to which class the cotton belongs?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the expectation is that these sets of samples will be purchased and used chiefly by commission merchants and the exchanges, and by the agricultural colleges, farmers' associations, and other organizations, so that the individual farmer will not find it necessary to buy them.

Mr. LEVER. And to be used also by the local cotton buyer.

Mr. SCOTT. I had him in mind when I said "commission merchants."

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Is it obligatory on those buying and selling to use these samples?

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all. The law does not attempt to impose these standards on the trade; we would have no authority to do that. It is the belief, however, of those connected with the cotton trade that as soon as these standards are promulgated they will be very generally adopted.

The work was not completed last summer in time for use in connection with the cotton crop of 1909, and therefore the Secretary has not given out any of these samples. It is his expectation, however, to promulgate these samples and offer them to the trade on the 1st of next September, and gentlemen connected with the cotton business are strongly of the opinion that they will be accepted in lieu of the grades which now prevail, not only in the cotton markets of our own country, but in those of foreign countries.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand that the only samples or standards heretofore used are those four in the little box?

Mr. SCOTT. No. That is just a sample box. I brought that one box as an illustration of the manner in which the commercial samples were put up. In the different cotton exchanges there has been a large number of different grades, with as wide a range as 18 to 60, and it was with a view to eliminating these innumerable grades and, if possible, standardizing the grading of cotton throughout the country that the law was passed in compliance with which these samples have been prepared.

Mr. COLLIER. I live in a district that is largely interested in cotton, and I wish to say that sample packages of cotton seed are allotted to us. I wish to know if it has come to the information of the committee whether or not that variety of seed is an early producer and intended to be used in those sections that the boll weevil has infested?

Mr. SCOTT. The cotton seed distributed by the department throughout the boll-weevil section are such as have been selected especially for their early maturing qualities. It is one of the ways in which they hope to escape the ravages of the boll weevil.

Mr. COLLIER. I have had a great many inquiries along that line.

Mr. SCOTT. The work of grain standardization, which has also been carried on by the Bureau of Plant Industry, I regret to say, does not seem to show very encouraging progress. They have succeeded in developing an electric device for testing the moisture in grain very rapidly, which is being introduced to some extent, and, of course, will be useful, because the moisture of grain determines largely what its grade will be. And the experts are still at work on the problem, hoping to discover some fundamental principles upon which they can base suggestions that will aid in the standardization of grain grading, but up to the present time they have reached no result that they thought worthy of publishing.

The Forest Service expended during the last fiscal year $4,646,200. Through the sale of timber, the lease of grazing lands, and other uses, it returned to the Treasury $1,807,270, so that the net cost of the service was $2,838,930. The greater part of this sum was expended, of course, in administering the forests and protecting them from fire, work in this latter respect having been particularly successful during the past year. But the Forest Service is carrying on all the time a great deal of very valuable scientific work—the purpose of which is to increase the resources and reduce the waste of our forests. The preservative treatment of railroad ties, telephone and telegraph poles, mine timbers, and so on, which has now become almost universal, and which extends the life of all such timbers many fold, was worked out and generally introduced by the Forest Service, and it undoubtedly results in a saving of many millions of dollars annually. The researches the service has been making into the possibility of making an economic use of the waste product of the sawmills have also attracted a great deal of attention. It has shown that the yellow-pine waste of the southern sawmills would be sufficient, if saved and distilled, to produce as much rosin and turpentine as is now produced from the southern pine forests by bleeding. It is simply a question of finding a commercially possible method of distillation. This seems already to have been accomplished, as there are now a considerable number of plants engaged in the manufacture of turpentine, tar, and other products from material which has heretofore been entirely wasted or used only for fuel.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I notice in the bill you change the method of appropriating for the Forest Service, a change which adds a great deal, in my judgment, to the efficiency of the appropriation. Was there any difficulty in making these specific appropriations on the part of the committee instead of by the old lump-sum method?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will doubtless remember that when the appropriation for the Forestry Bureau was criticised on the floor last year on the ground that it carried too much money in a lump sum, the committee stated that there had been recently a change made in the policy whereby district headquarters were established in the field, instead of concentrating all the work here in Washington, and until that policy had been worked out a little further it did not seem practicable to more closely itemize the bill. This year the chief of the service was able to report that the policy had worked well, and it was upon his recommendation that the committee itemized the appropriation as it appears in the bill. The chief of the service said to us that he had given the matter a very great deal of thought and attention, having been notified by the committee last year that it would expect this year's estimates to be itemized, and it was his judgment that the best way to itemize the appropriation was to segregate the forests, making a specific appropriation for each individual forest, and then divide the remainder of the appropriation among the different groups of scientific work that is being carried on in the bureau. It seemed to the committee that this was a logical and would probably prove to be a satisfactory arrangement.

Mr. MANN. I think the committee is very much to be commended for what they have done.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question? I notice on page 18 of the present bill that for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil the sum of $215,155 is appropriated. That is a decrease in the bill from the last appropriation of several thousand dollars. I would like to know if that decrease was made upon the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman is mistaken in thinking that there is a decrease in this paragraph. As a matter of fact the appropriation last year for this work was $225,000, of which $50,000 was immediately available. That is to say, $175,000 is all that is available for this work during the current fiscal year, whereas in this bill the department will have $215,155 to expend. In answer specifically to the gentleman's last question, I will say that it is precisely the amount recommended by the Secretary.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is his understanding that in addition to the $215,155 recommended for the study of the boll weevil, we are to have available, out of another appropriation, the sum of $9,845. Is that the understanding of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman refers to the appropriation for the Bureau of Entomology. I do not remember the exact sum, but there is a considerable sum in the appropriation for the support of the Bureau of Entomology, which will be used in the boll-weevil work.

Mr. LEVER. The impression has gone out that the appropriation in this bill will be equal to $255,000, although $215,000 comes out of one appropriation and $9,000 out of another appropriation. Is that the fact, as you understand it?

Mr. SCOTT. I will say that the amount carried in this bill will fully equal the amount that was available for the use of the department during the present fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. A good deal more.

Mr. SCOTT. And a good deal more, as I explained to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LEVER. I do not concede the increase, but admit there is no decrease.

Mr. SCOTT. There is another thing in regard to this matter. Fifty thousand dollars of the amount carried in the last bill was made immediately available, and, as a matter of fact, was used prior to June 30, 1909, so that left for the current fiscal year only $175,000.

Mr. LEVER. I understand that.

Mr. SCOTT. In the Bureau of Entomology the most gratifying achievement reported is the complete control of the pear thrips, a minute insect which a year ago threatened absolutely to destroy the orchard industry of the Pacific coast. So widespread was the infestation and so complete the destruction in some parts of California that the fruit growers were in despair. One man in the Santa Clara Valley had actually begun cutting down an orchard worth $250,000. The scientists of this bureau discovered by their studies of the life and history of the insect that from 70 to 75 per cent of them could be destroyed by plowing at a certain time of the year, and that 90 to 95 per cent of those that escape the plow can be killed by proper methods of spraying. The victory is so complete that the fruit growers have entirely regained confidence and the problem is regarded as solved.

The campaign against the gypsy moth in New England has proceeded along the same lines as last year, with conditions said to be steadily but very slowly improving. In this, as in the fight against the boll weevil, the chief ground of hope for the ultimate control of the pest lies in the activity of its natural enemies. A number of parasites have been successfully introduced, and one species has been found spread over an area of 500 square miles. Fortunately it attacks both the gypsy and the brown-tail moths, and it is hoped that it will multiply rapidly enough to act as a decided check upon both of them. It is worthy of remark, in passing, that the States in which this work is being done show their appreciation of it by contributing large sums from their own funds to help carry it on, the amount thus contributed last year aggregating $941,400, as against $300,000 expended by the department.

In commenting on the work of the biological service——

Mr. LEVER. Before the gentleman leaves the subject of the gypsy moth and the boll weevil, I fear he has unwittingly given an impression that the hope of the department to control the cotton boll weevil is through the parasite. My information, from the statement made by gentlemen in charge of this work, is that their hope of controlling the weevil lies in their being able to make crops in spite of the weevil, and that the department does not have much faith in the parasite theory.

Mr. SCOTT. That was the expression they used with reference to "the control" of the boll weevil, and the impression I have gained from the scientists who appeared before our committee justified the use of that expression. They declared, without any qualification, that the methods adopted had been very satisfactory in Texas and in other sections where the climate was dry and very warm; but they stated that in a portion of the country where the climate was not only warm, but moist, and cotton fields were surrounded by forests, affording shelter for the boll weevils, that they had not yet been able by any cultural methods to overcome them. The gentleman from South Carolina, a member of the committee, will remember the case of one particular plantation about which the statement was made that two years ago it had produced 1,500 bales of cotton, last year 750, and this year not one bale, although 700 acres had been planted to cotton this year. The difficulty, of course, is in the number of boll weevils that are able to live through the winter and come out actively in the spring; and this difficulty, the scientists believe, it will be extremely hard to combat. They do not hold out any hope—and I am sure the gentleman from South Carolina will bear me out in this statement—that within a year or two the problem can be met. Mr. Hunter, the gentleman in direct charge of the work, declared, in his judgment, that it would mean a wide change in the locality of cotton growing; that there were some fields on nearly every plantation where the methods which they now advised would be successful in combating the boll weevil, but that there are great areas, differently located, where the present methods were unable to meet the emergency, and that they would have to meet it in other ways.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I ask the chairman of the committee if the appropriation for the investigation of insects affecting grape vineyards is as large as last year, or large enough to warrant the continuation of the present investigation along those lines? I know that in Chautauqua County, N. Y., and in Erie County, Pa., a grape worm has threatened the industry, and they have been very anxious to obtain the services of a certain specialist who has seemed to be reaching or about to find a cure or some help, at least, in the direction of the extermination of that insect.

Mr. SCOTT. There has been no reduction in the appropriations for the Bureau of Entomology. There has been a little shifting of the sums under the various paragraphs, but I feel sure that the work to which the gentleman alludes can be carried forward as efficiently as it has been in the past year.

In commenting upon the work of the Bureau of Biological Survey, Doctor Merriam, the chief of the bureau, made the rather startling report that a large number of the ground squirrels infesting great areas in California are found to be infected with the bubonic plague. Nine cases are known in which the disease has been communicated to human beings, and in seven of them the patient died.

The serious feature of the situation—

To quote from Doctor Merriam's statement to the committee—is that for the first time in the history of the United States we now have plague in an endemic form, propagated and continued by means of fleas on native rodents, just as is the case in India. In India plague is endemic; that is, it exists all the time—perpetuated by fleas on a native squirrel (Sciurus palmarum), and a certain number of people die from it every year, but every few years it assumes an acute, malignant type and spreads with great rapidity, killing hundreds of thousands of people. So far as I am aware we have not yet had an outbreak of the malignant type of plague in California, but who will venture to say that such an outbreak may not occur in hot weather? It is exceedingly important to ascertain as soon as possible the southernmost limit of plague-infested ground squirrels, and to isolate them from those of the rest of the States by cutting a swath around them to the south, and then to work backward and kill them off, exterminating them throughout the area of known infestation.

And that is what the Bureau of Biological Survey, in cooperation with the Marine-Hospital Service and with the local authorities, is undertaking to do.

There is only one other line of work that the department has been doing in which I think members of the committee may have a special interest, and that is the matter of testing materials for paper making. For the past two or three years we have been appropriating $10,000 a year for carrying on that work, and the committee, and I think the country, have been very much interested in it. The work during the past year has been in two directions. In collaboration with the Forest Service experiments have been made with different varieties of wood, and under the direction of the Bureau of Plant Industry experiments have been made with deciduous plants in the hope of finding some annual that could be profitably grown for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has occupied one hour of his time. There yet remain fifteen minutes of his time and twenty minutes released by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. SCOTT. I believe the gentleman from Virginia yielded to me what time remained to him. I will ask the attention of the committee but a few minutes longer.

The work that has been done in cooperation with the Bureau of Forestry has resulted in discovering a number of trees which have heretofore not been used for the purpose that make a very excellent quality of wood pulp. At the present time, however, none of these trees can be procured any more cheaply than the spruce and fir, which now constitute our principal sources of supply for wood pulp, and I think there has been no practical result.

In the matter of the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry, about the only plant they have found which seems to be very promising is the common cornstalk. They have experimented in two ways. They have tried growing the corn for no other purpose than for manufacturing fiber, and they have tried taking the cornstalks from the fields after the ears have been harvested, and with very excellent results in both cases. While there is no doubt of the fact that high-grade paper can be made from cornstalks, still, under present economic conditions, as long as spruce pulp can be obtained at present rates, it is not likely that a great industry will be built up in the manufacture of paper from cornstalks.

The bill recommends the continuation of the appropriation of $10,000, however, to carry on the work, because it is obvious that if some substitute for wood pulp could be found it would be worth many millions of dollars to the people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I overlooked a request on the part of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], a member of the committee, for a few minutes' time during the general debate; and before relinquishing the floor I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to print such remarks as he would have made in this debate if time had been allotted to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] may extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have concluded what I had in mind to say by way of comment on the bill and upon the work of the department, and I shall now be glad to answer any questions that Members wish to ask me, if I can. I will yield first to the gentleman from Ohio, who first addressed me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I want to ask the gentleman, in the first place, if I understood him correctly in saying that this bill substantially follows the bill in amount and distribution that we had a year ago from his committee?

Mr. SCOTT. Substantially the same. There is a net increase, as I remember it, of $422,100.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I also understood the gentleman to say that the committee has substantially followed in this bill the requests of the Secretary.

Mr. SCOTT. I made that statement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I also understood him further to say that in this bill the Secretary had stated to the committee that he had been governed in his estimates or requests more perhaps by the request of the Executive that this year's appropriations in the department generally ought not to be increased.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think I said just that. I said I presumed that the Secretary had recognized the necessity of economy when he made up his estimates, and that he was willing to bear his share of the responsibility for economy in presenting the estimates in the shape in which he did.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would also like to ask the gentleman if he and the committee do not recognize the fact that whatever may be the effect of the present agitation and boycott against the eating of meat, and other efforts of that kind, either instigated by the newspapers or by some one else, that, after all, the underlying cause for the condition which confronts us is due, as I understood the gentleman to say, in part, at least, to the lessening of the cultivated area, or rather the lessening of the area which may be brought into cultivation from lands which have not been heretofore cultivated, the lessening of production, and various cognate causes; and that, after all, the ultimate thing the country must look to for relief is the improvement in the agricultural conditions, an increase of the amount that may be raised on the land, and the restoration of the old and partly worn lands of the country? Although I have badly stated it, is not that the view of the gentleman, in a general way?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman states it very well, and I think we all agree that if the demands of our increased population are to be met, it must be chiefly by an increase in the crop yields.

That, of course, can only be obtained by better farming and the introduction of more prolific seed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understood the gentleman to say, in speaking of the work of the Agricultural Department in that regard, especially the Bureau of Plant Industry, that its success in its efforts in this direction were "startling," or "unparalleled," or "phenomenal," or some such adjective—that the work which this department has been carrying on has been eminently successful.

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly intended to give that impression.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the gentleman doubt that, instead of building two battle ships this year, if we added $5,000,000 to the appropriation for the various useful bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, that Secretary Wilson would be able to spend the money wisely and judiciously?

Mr. SCOTT. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that, in the first place, under our present system of appropriations, as the gentleman knows very well, there is no way by which we could make that kind of a trade. We might appropriate $10,000,000 here with the understanding in the minds of the Committee on Agriculture that the Department of Agriculture would have $10,000,000 more to spend, and that we would not have a new battle ship; but, unfortunately, or fortunately, depending upon the point of view, that would not influence the Committee on Naval Affairs or the House or the Senate, and after our increased appropriation had been made we might still have the battle ship.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the gentleman sure that it would not influence the House? Is the gentleman sure that if the Committee on Agriculture, with full consciousness of the conditions and our duty to the country, had come in here and, instead of asking for a million and a half for this bureau, had asked for $3,000,000, that the House would not give it to them?

Mr. SCOTT. I trust that the House has great confidence in the Committee on Agriculture, but I doubt if the House would have justified the committee in doubling the estimates of the Secretary for any bureau of this department. If the gentleman will permit me to speak for a moment——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly; it is a matter in which I take a great deal of interest.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to say in reference to the point the gentleman is obviously making, that the Committee on Agriculture appreciates as fully as the gentleman from Ohio or any other gentleman does, the work of the department and the value of that work to the country, and it is more anxious than the average committee is to promote that work.

It has kept in close touch with it. It calls before it every year the Secretary of Agriculture and the chiefs of his various bureaus and interrogates them about the work they are doing, the work they intend to do, and the amount of money they think will be needed to carry forward their projects. The Committee on Agriculture therefore is in very close and very sympathetic touch with the department. If it has failed to recommend in this bill increases which the gentleman thinks ought to have been recommended, it has been for two reasons; first, because the committee thinks the condition of the Treasury calls for economy, and, second, because it believes there is a limit to the amount of money that can be efficiently and economically expended, even in the best of work. I quoted during my remarks the observations of Doctor Galloway, in which he declared with emphasis that he believed it would be a good thing for them to have a breathing spell, in order that they might adjust the "loose joints" that might have resulted from too rapid growth, and work out their problems with greater care, with greater attention to detail than they had been able to do during this period of very rapid growth, and Doctor Galloway's remark appealed to me as having a basis in good common sense.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to what the gentleman has said, but I want to go back now to the gentleman's statement, that it is not possible for the Committee on Agriculture to make a trade with the Committee on Naval Affairs, and secure in place of an extra battle ship another $5,000,000 for the Agricultural Department, that there is no provision in our proceedings in Congress made for that sort of a trade. Is that what the gentleman meant?

Mr. SCOTT. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Admitting we have only so much to spend, if it be the opinion of the House that it is more advisable to spend three or four million dollars more in one direction, say in the direction of improving our agricultural conditions, and three or four million dollars less in some other direction, is not the only way that we can under present conditions accomplish that result for the gentlemen of the Committee on Agriculture to bring in a bill and submit it to the House asking for these largely increased appropriations, or else have the House itself on the floor increase these appropriations, doing it upon the theory that we are to cut down expenses in some other direction?

Mr. SCOTT. Suppose the Committee on Agriculture had brought in a bill recommending $10,000,000 more than it would have felt warranted in recommending, if it knew that the Committee on Naval Affairs was to bring in an estimate for an additional battle ship, upon the theory that the battle ship would be eliminated and the House should pass the bill as reported by the Committee on Agriculture. Then the Committee on Naval Affairs would bring in its bill, containing a provision for this extra battle ship, the money for which we understood we had already expended. Now, does the gentleman believe that any Member on this floor would be influenced in his vote upon the naval bill by the suggestion that the money provided by the naval appropriation bill for a battle ship had already been carried in an appropriation bill of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think there are some of us who would.

Mr. SCOTT. But not enough to make a majority of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think all of us ought to be influenced by it. In other words, it all goes back to a principle that I have contended for here, as the gentleman knows, namely, we ought to have some general committee in this House to supervise estimates, expenditures, and appropriations generally, and to make some sort of a report, from which the House can gather what it can do and thereby determine what it should do with reference to appropriations. I certainly believe that if, in insisting upon an increase of appropriations to the Agricultural Department, it were admitted that the increase in these appropriations might necessitate less expenditure upon some fortification at Subic Bay or Pearl Harbor or some less amount for battle ships, the Members of the House have sufficient intelligence to appreciate this fact and to carry it in their minds, and when the time comes make the reduction in that appropriation bill, from whatever committee it comes. I certainly think so.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize heartily with the gentleman's wish that we might have a budget all before us at once, so that the House could, as it were, trade one item for another in the way the gentleman has suggested. But we have not that sort of a system. I am not able to extemporize a suggestion as to how we might get it. For the present, therefore, I think that each appropriation committee must simply exercise the best judgment it has and submit its recommendations to the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In connection, I want to say this to the gentleman and to the House on my own responsibility, that I know from the Secretary himself with reference to the Office of Roads, the Bureau of Plant Industry, the Bureau of Entomology, or any of these bureaus which are doing such a tremendously successful work to make farm life more profitable and attractive in every way—I say that I know of my own knowledge that if this House gives him the money the Secretary knows how to spend it advisedly, and I shall appeal to the House earnestly when the time comes to increase one or more of these appropriations carried in this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who desired to ask me a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, before asking the question I contemplated asking the gentleman I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] that the chairman of the committee has not given all the reasons why the plan proposed by the gentleman from Ohio would not be successful. I am rather inclined personally to favor the plan of the gentleman from Ohio, but the chairman of the committee has omitted to state to him that we always have a war scare at the time the Committee on Naval Affairs report an appropriation for the building of a couple of extra battle ships.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know we have each year I have been here; I have noticed that.

Mr. NORRIS. The question I desire to ask of the chairman of the committee is whether he would not continue the very interesting explanation of the work of these different bureaus by giving us an idea of the work that has been done and that is contemplated to be done by the Office of Roads. I think the chairman did not refer to that in any way in making the explanation he has already made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I would rather answer the gentleman from Nebraska, if I may, for just a moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. NORRIS. No; he has not answered my question.

Mr. SCOTT. The work of the Office of Roads has been carried forward during the past year along the usual lines, with particular attention, perhaps, to experiments looking to the discovery of some sort of surface for roads that will keep down the dust and will protect the roads from the wear of high-speed vehicles. The best results they have obtained, according to the report of the director, were from the use of a certain preparation in which Portland cement was a large ingredient. They have also obtained excellent results by the use of the waste from molasses and sugar mills.

One thing which was particularly gratifying to the committee was a statement made by the director that the work of his office had been facilitated rather than hindered by the provision inserted in the last bill prohibiting the further use of road-making material. Gentlemen will remember that there was an earnest protest against that provision when the committee reported the bill last year, the argument being that it would prevent the Office of Public Roads from doing a great deal of very valuable work. The attention of the director of the office was called to that matter when he was before the committee, and he made this statement:

> When this provision was put in, Mr. Page felt rather anxious as to the outcome of the work, and a great many people who were interested in the work of the Office of Public Roads felt that the work had been to a considerable extent crippled. We have now learned by experience that this is not the case, and the figures showing the extension of our object-lesson road work throughout the country are very significant in this respect. The report shows that in 1907 we constructed something like 200,000 square yards of object-lesson roads; the following year, when we still had some road-building machinery on hand, 223,000 square yards of object-lesson roads were constructed; in 1909, without any machinery which belonged to the Office of Public Roads, we constructed 690,000 square yards. These results, therefore, justify the wisdom of the committee in putting the provision into the bill.

That is, they were able to secure the construction of more than three times as much model road as they had been able to construct when they owned and operated the machinery. The difference in that result, bearing out the judgment of the committee, was due to the fact that instead of spending their time and money in the actual manual operation of machines they could expend it in expert advice, and that is the most valuable work which the Office of Public Roads is now doing. In various parts of the country, when the good-roads movement gets an impetus and communities wish to build roads on a large scale, the bureau is amply able, with the appropriation we now authorize, to send an expert to that community—an engineer—who can go over the roads, indicate the best variety of material to be used and the best system of construction, and assist the local authorities in making plans for the roads and in determining all the problems relating to them. The committee feels, therefore, as if the House had done well in making the change that was made last year in the language of this paragraph.

Mr. COLLIER. I listened with a great deal of pleasure and profit to your remarks this morning, but there is one matter concerning which I have an indistinct recollection. I simply want to know if the amount of money appropriated for the destruction of the boll weevil in this bill is sufficient for that purpose in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SCOTT. We did not question the Secretary of Agriculture on that particular item, and we did not question Doctor Knapp. The committee consulted with Doctor Galloway, as the chief of the bureau under which most of the work is done, and with Doctor Howard, the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, who also does some of the work. Doctor Galloway declared, with a good deal of emphasis, that he had not asked for any increase, because he believed the amounts appropriated were sufficient, and Doctor Howard was of the opinion, so far, at least, as anything he said to the committee would indicate, that with the appropriation carried in this bill he would be able to go forward with the part of the work which he was doing.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe that this provision here in regard to the experiment-station work is the authority under which the Secretary of Agriculture sends out expert lecturers to do institute work?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to ask the chairman if the appropriation that can be utilized for that purpose is the same as it was in the last bill?

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly the same.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, is there not a very large increase in the demand for this work all over the country?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the demand for it is increasing, and I was partially in error in stating to the gentleman that the paragraph to which he alludes under the Office of Experiment Stations carries the only appropriation available for this work. There are appropriations all through the bill for the traveling expenses of agents of the department that can be used in this lecturing work. We regard it as a part of the demonstration work, the publicity work, of the department—a very valuable part of it—and at the proper time I expect to be able to show that there is available for demonstration work, part of which can be used for defraying expenses of lecturers, nearly $500,000 in this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the chairman mean by that that there will be ample provision made to meet the demands for this sort of work in this bill?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not believe that the demand could be met by the appropriations in this bill even if they were multiplied fourfold.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it not be well to increase the appropriation in that line? That is the question I want to get at.

Mr. LAMB. I would suggest that under the five-minute rule the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] will have ample opportunity to present that matter.

Mr. SCOTT. That is my individual judgment, of course; and as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] suggests, we can discuss it further under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to direct the gentleman's attention to the provision on page 62 authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the cost of food supplies at the farms and to the consumer, and to ask him in that connection whether, in his judgment, sufficient provision is now made for inspection by the Secretary of Agriculture of goods that go into cold storage, as, for instance, meats, butter, and eggs?

Mr. SCOTT. The committee has no information either from the Secretary of Agriculture or anyone connected with his department that the appropriation made for enforcing the pure-food law is not sufficient.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia now investigating the question of cold storage it appeared, from statements by the Secretary and the chief chemist of the Government, that they are without power to properly inspect eggs that are placed in cold storage; that the number of inspectors is so scant that they are practically dependent upon one or two men to supervise the entry into the storage warehouses of the country of all the great quantity of eggs that go there.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman probably understands that there is one appropriation for the meat-inspection work of the Bureau of Animal Industry and an entirely different appropriation for the enforcement of the pure-food act, which is under the Bureau of Chemistry. I doubt very much whether the Bureau of Chemistry would have authority to appoint anybody to inspect cold-storage plants unless it could be shown that such inspection was in direct connection with interstate commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that provision was made some time ago for inspection of cold-storage warehouses under the direction of the Bureau of Chemistry, which appropriation was subsequently withdrawn?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not remember that there was ever such a provision. There was a provision carried for several years in the bill authorizing the chief of the Bureau of Chemistry to investigate the results and the effect of cold storage upon the quality of different classes of food, which provision was carried as long as the work was going on. When the chief of the bureau reported that this investigation had been satisfactorily concluded of course it was omitted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point has been made that the bureau was without power to properly inspect those articles in the nature of food products which enter into cold storage and which are held there for long periods of time before delivery to the consumer.

Mr. SCOTT. Would the gentleman believe that the Bureau of Chemistry under any provision of an appropriation bill would have authority to go to Philadelphia and inspect cold-storage warehouses?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the commodity were interstate commerce I would think so.

Mr. SCOTT. Could an inspection be made until the commodity had entered into interstate commerce?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The charge is made that there are 1,800,000,000 eggs in cold storage. Whether this is true or not, many of these eggs come out of the Western States and into the Eastern States, where they are placed in cold storage. That is interstate commerce.

Mr. SCOTT. Are not the Eastern States able to take care of that situation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are, and in most instances do.

Mr. SCOTT. They are live eggs when they leave our State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is interstate commerce. But we are advised that the eggs enter into the storage warehouse in the interior of the country, in another State, and then, after being there for a period of time, are sent to the Eastern States and the extreme Western States, and there remain for an indefinite period before they are sold to the consumer.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Would not that take a law authorizing the inspection of these eggs which would have to come from the Interstate Commerce Committee before you could appropriate money for that purpose?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was trying to get from the committee whether or not it was enabled through an appropriation to make a provision which would preserve the public health of this country. While I heartily approve of this provision, which directs and authorizes the Secretary to make an investigation and report, there seems to be no appropriation that would enable him in any way to operate upon his own findings.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think there is some confusion in the mind of the gentleman, due to a misunderstanding of the work that has heretofore been done under authority of an appropriation bill by the Bureau of Chemistry in the matter of studying the effect of cold storage. That appropriation was not made to permit the department to inspect cold-storage products. It was made, as I stated a moment ago, to enable the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry to investigate the results of cold storage. He put up a cold-storage plant in his own bureau, in which he placed various articles of food and kept them, taking them out and testing them at different times, in order to determine the length of time after cold storage began when the articles commenced to deteriorate in quality. There never was any authority in this bill to enable him to inspect cold-storage warehouses in this or any other city; and I do not believe the bill could properly carry such an appropriation.

As to the paragraph to which the gentleman has called attention, authorizing the Secretary to inquire into the cost of various articles of farm products, and so forth, that is a paragraph which was inserted by the committee merely in order that there could be no question of the authority of the Secretary to conduct this investigation. He had already begun work under what he believed to be sufficient authority, and what he had done attracted the favorable attention of the entire country. The committee believed that the House would desire the work to go on, and we wanted to insert a provision in this bill which would eliminate any possible criticism. The Secretary was very glad to have the paragraph inserted and did not ask for any additional appropriation in order to carry it into effect, because he believed he had sufficient funds already.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The paragraph as it now reads simply contemplates investigation and publicity.

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No action based upon the facts found.

Mr. SCOTT. No action can be taken under this paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is evident, so far as our inquiries have gone, that there undoubtedly is an unnatural rise in the price of foodstuffs, as between the producer in the gentleman's section of the country and the consumer in my section of the country. I thought, possibly, in a paragraph of this kind some provision might be made for removing those obstructions when found by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. The membership of the House, I am sure, are all awaiting with the greatest interest a report which the gentleman's committee will make, and which I trust will recommend legislation to meet the conditions he describes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Total for office of the Secretary, $198,770.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not propose to weary the House by the reiteration of one song; but I do propose, if I stay in Congress, to keep up an agitation for a different system of making appropriations here than that which we are now pursuing. Just look at the situation that you and I and all of us here have before us in this House with reference to this matter of appropriations. I do not believe there is a man within the sound of my voice who does not heartily agree with me that we might cut off appropriations for the army and navy somewhere and add to the amount carried in this agricultural appropriation bill, with benefit to the American people. [Applause.] Yet how are you going to do it under the present system? Just look at the situation in which we find ourselves here as legislators in this House, which has charge of the money of this Nation. Where and when and how can you and I in this House intelligently and effectively declare that "We do not want two battle ships; that economy is necessary; that therefore we will have one battle ship, and instead of spending $10,000,000 for that extra battle ship we will add $5,000,000 to the agricultural appropriation bill, to the benefit of every man, woman, and child in the United States."

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio is not talking to the bill that is before the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am most emphatically talking to the bill now before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, the Chair thinks, is within the rule. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Now, gentleman, I hold in my hand a resolution that I am going to offer, and I am going to offer it in every Congress as long as I am here, and I am going to stand on this floor and advocate it as long as I have opportunity to do so; and if anybody is going to get tired of it, I am sorry, but it shall not deter me. To my mind the method under which we appropriate money in this House is unworthy of the American Congress. As I have said before, and as I shall repeat, we have no sort of method by which we can overlook the whole field of American activity, no way of distributing according to the will of this House the money of this Government to those objects which this House itself wants to see fostered and promoted.

The resolution that I am going to read and which I propose to introduce has exact relation to this very situation. We are told that economy is necessary; that the President himself has insisted that the different departments shall cut down every appropriation; and, consequently, that the Agricultural Department can not have anything more than it had a year ago; and this in face of the fact that this country from one end to the other is in a perfect blaze of revolution against the high price of foodstuffs, which high prices are principally due to the decrease in our food supply raised upon the farms of this country.

Is not that ludicrous, if it is not worse? Now, I do not mean that this plan which I propose is a panacea for all of our ills, but I do submit that this or something like it should be adopted. If the distinguished gentleman, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, had introduced it, it would get more attention than it will from me. If the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who, I think, ought to have long since attended to it, had introduced it, it would get far more consideration than when introduced by me. But if it commends itself ultimately to the good sense and business judgment of the men of this House, regardless of politics, we will get it some day, and then I submit that we will have a different system of making appropriations. I hope if any gentleman can improve it he will do so, either on the floor of the House or in any way or at any time. I shall welcome any suggestions for its improvement.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the following be a rule of the House, to be numbered paragraph 63 of Rule XI—

Rule XI is that rule of the House which in paragraph 62 states the duty of each committee of the House—

The Committee on Ways and Means, together with the chairmen of the committees of the House empowered under the rules and practice to report appropriations from the National Treasury, shall constitute a Committee on Estimates and Expenditures; which committee shall, as soon after the convening of each regular session of Congress as may be, report to the House the amount of revenue probably available for appropriation for the next fiscal year, and apportion this amount to the several appropriation bills within the jurisdiction of the committees empowered by the rules and practice of the House to report appropriations. This report may be made at any time, and when agreed to by the House shall limit the appropriations of the several committees.

Now, what is the Committee on Ways and Means doing today in this House? Look at the situation. The tariff bill was passed last year. We may not have another for ten years, and meanwhile we have segregated some twenty of the most valuable Members of this House, on both sides, and put them on a shelf and given them a room where they may hang up their coats and hats, and doing nothing of very great moment as a committee in the life and business of this House. Is it not a fact?

Please understand me.

I am not talking about the individual influence of these Members upon the legislation that goes on here, but so far as committee work is concerned there are ten or twenty committees in this House that have far more to do to-day than the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, let that great committee add to itself the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the chairmen of all of those committees that are authorized to make appropriations, and let them at the beginning of the session look over the field of national activity, and let them make an estimate of what the revenues are to be, and make some sort of an apportionment of how the money is to be spent.

In that way this House can act upon that report, and if we choose to take one or two or three million dollars from the Committee on Naval Affairs, or from any other appropriation committee, and add it to agriculture, internal improvements, Indian affairs, or whatever object, we have an opportunity to do it. You may call it a "Committee on the Budget," if you please, or what you please; but I submit that it will supply a deficiency in the procedure of this House—it will supply a place where that can be done which it is essential for this House to do and which we do not now have any opportunity to do.

When I asked the distinguished chairman of the Agricultural Committee whether or not the Committee on Agriculture could spend more money in these beneficent ways than is appropriated here, he said that doubtless they could. Why not give it to them? Because we must exercise economy. Why? Simply because we have only so much to spend, vast as it may be, and first we, of course, must make appropriations for those great purposes of Government upon which the life of the Government depends, such as the army, navy, and the rest. But we do not necessarily have to appropriate as we have been doing. In the language of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, 71 per cent of our revenues is for preparation for war and payment for past wars, and then we appropriate only 2 per cent to the great agricultural interests of this country. I submit to Members of this House that that was a startling statement which the chairman of the committee made at Chicago last spring, although not new, perhaps, to many of us. And so, in this connection, I simply want to call attention of the House to the fact that we have no place and no means by which, as the chairman of this committee must admit, where we can exchange a battle ship for an agricultural appropriation, or any means by which we can say we will lessen an appropriation here and increase it there. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged by the committee for a few minutes, I would like to say a few words in respect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] about our system of making appropriations, a suggestion that is not new, for it has been made several times before. When he made the statement, at the beginning of his remarks, expressing regret that his proposition was not fathered by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because that person has more influence than he has in this House, he forgot what transpired here last Tuesday, when he, through his influence, succeeded in increasing appropriations while I failed, notwithstanding a very strenuous effort to keep them down. [Laughter.]

His criticism of the system under which general appropriations are made for public expenditures is to a large extent just, but the adoption of the one he suggests, which he says would enable this House to take several million dollars from one department and appropriate it for the activities of another department, would be no improvement over our present system. If his plan for a committee, composed of the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and of the chairmen of the several committees having jurisdiction of appropriations, were adopted, all that committee could possibly do would be to apportion the aggregate of the revenues to the several committees, leaving the committees to which this apportionment had been made to prepare the details of the appropriations for the activities of the departments for which they respectively appropriate.

This general committee would deal only with the regular annual estimates. It could not consider supplemental estimates, nor deficiency estimates, nor could it control appropriations authorized at each session of Congress for which no estimates were submitted. There would be no chance to modify or change this apportionment as a whole when once made, either on the floor of the House or by this general committee. It would have to be done by each committee according to its best judgment. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman from Ohio in his statement that we could reduce our war expenditures so far as those expenditures relate to the preparation for war, and expend the excess amount we are to-day expending for that purpose on internal improvements of various kinds, including agriculture and the improvement of our rivers and harbors. If this House would exercise its legitimate function and refuse to appropriate the amount asked for by these departments unless necessity therefor was clearly shown, no matter what was recommended by the committees that represent these two great departments—the army and navy—we would then have more money in the Treasury which we could appropriate and expend for other activities along peaceful and more beneficial lines than we are to-day expending. The remedy the gentleman proposes for the evil would not be effective, because the committees that make these appropriations must of necessity analyze all of the estimates submitted for appropriations, including supplemental estimates, and they would be governed by the necessities of the service for which they are authorized to appropriate, regardless of their allotment. As long as we have in this House seven or eight committees clothed with the jurisdiction and power of making appropriations independent of each other and without any reference to the aggregate estimated revenues, just so long will we have seven or eight committees that are the representatives of the departments submitting their estimates, and for which they make appropriations, instead of these committees representing the House in the matter of public expenditures. This, Mr. Chairman, will be true whether we have the general committee proposed by the gentleman from Ohio to allot the total appropriations, or whether we continue the present system.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Was the gentleman in the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The gentleman has read the debate which took place, which Mr. Randall, of Pensylvania, led upon the one side and Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, on the other?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am familiar with that debate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the gentleman advocate the consolidation of all the appropriations in one committee, as was done at that time?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the gentleman in that connection advocate the system that then prevailed in this House, under which substantially the only way to get any legislation of any kind through the House was by attaching it to one of the appropriation bills?

Mr. TAWNEY. No. That does not follow necessarily, and I would not advocate that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Was it not almost the universal practice as a result of that?

Mr. TAWNEY. That was the practice, but it did not follow because of the fact that one committee at that time had exclusive jurisdiction over all appropriations. It was because of the rule of the House expressly permitting legislation on appropriation bills, if on its face such legislation retrenched expenditures. Much of the legislation referred to was formulated by committees not having jurisdiction over appropriations and was offered by them as amendments to general appropriation bills. It was the rule in question that made the mischief complained of, and not the fact that all appropriation bills were formulated in one committee.

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER. What is the gentleman's plan?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not considered offering a plan, but if I did, my plan would be this: Create under the rules of this House one committee of sufficient size to take jurisdiction of and prepare all of the appropriation bills, leaving that committee to create subcommittees, and having each subcommittee under the control of the general committee. In that way you would have a co-relation of the various activities of the Government with the estimated revenues of the Government for each coming fiscal year.

Until 1865 all appropriation bills were reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. In that year the Committee on Appropriations was created, and until 1880 that committee had initial control over all appropriations. In 1880 the Agricultural Committee was given control over all appropriations for the Agricultural Department, and the river and harbor bill was given the status of a general appropriation bill under control of the Committee on Commerce and subsequently the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. In 1885 there was taken from control of the Committee on Appropriations six more of the general appropriation bills, and since then we have had eight different committees, to say nothing of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in this House exercising jurisdiction, independent of each other, over the general appropriation bills, with the result that some branches of the public service seem to have grown quite fat while others are lean, according to the activities of their foster parents, the respective committees clothed with power to look after their welfare and growth. In this connection the knowledge comes with startling force that during the first decade following the present general distribution of the appropriation bills in 1885 the total of the money bills, excepting pensions, increased on a per capita basis of population nearly $700,000,000 over the decade preceding, or more than 46 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman from Ohio has brought this matter up. While I have little or no hope of ever creating or having this House create one committee, however large that committee may be, and clothing it with exclusive jurisdiction over all appropriations, nevertheless it is a fact that if that were done we would materially reduce the appropriations. Why? You would then have one committee of this House responsible for the aggregate of all appropriations. That committee would be responsible not only to this House, but it would be responsible to the country for the aggregate of the appropriations of each session of Congress. You would not then have divided responsibility, as now. You would then have a committee——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not now—that would be confronted at all times with the aggregate expenditures and the aggregate revenues of the previous year and the estimated expenditures and estimated revenues for the coming fiscal year. Its responsibility to this House and to the country would of necessity prompt that committee to keep the appropriations recommended to the House within the estimated revenues. Now I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the chairman of that committee would be the most powerful man in the United States, would he not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not afraid of the power of any man in this House so long as the exercise of that power is under the control of a majority of this House, as it would be in this and has been in all other cases. The chairman of that committee when the committee had jurisdiction of all appropriations was no more powerful than was the Speaker of the House or the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. This is proven by the fact that while he was chairman of that committee, the Speaker of the House and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means were sufficiently powerful to divide the jurisdiction of his committee and place it among the other committees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The additional time allotted to the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes, as I desire to ask him one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What became of that scheme you had, and which you got through here—my recollection is it went through last year—to require the President of the United States and the Cabinet to send in a budget here, and we were all going to be happy as soon as we got that budget?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri has asked me that question. The plan proposed by section 7 of the last sundry civil bill has had the result of reducing the estimates below the appropriations for the current fiscal year about $58,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, wait a minute; but notwithstanding that, it was this House which proposed to increase the appropriations beyond the amount of the estimates. The army appropriation bill, which has already passed the House, passed at an increase of some $600,000 or $700,000 above the annual estimates.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, did not you know that was exactly what would happen——

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute—when you got your budget proposition through the House?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I never contemplated anything of the kind, and it would not have happened if the Members of this House would have reduced the appropriations for the army and other appropriation bills, keeping them within the estimates of the departments. But that is not the only danger. I said the other day, whether the gentleman from Missouri was on the floor or not, and warned the House that if we continued to make appropriations for which there were no estimates and increased the appropriations for which estimates are made this House, more than any other branch of the legislative department of the Government, will have to take the responsibility before the people of the charge of extravagance.

We are to-day, in this House, increasing the appropriations not only beyond the estimates, but we are appropriating money for new projects for which there have been no estimates. And another thing to which I want to call the attention of the House is that the regular annual estimates are being supplemented every day by supplemental estimates that of necessity increases the appropriations. It is, therefore, of the utmost necessity that every Member of this House should see to it that new appropriations are not authorized beyond the actual necessities of the public service, and that appropriations made upon estimates regularly submitted should not be in excess of those estimates.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have helped the gentleman to make a good many fights in this House for economy, and we have generally got licked——

Mr. TAWNEY. Generally got licked.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; we did. Now, I want to ask another question, and that is, Does the reduction in the amount of estimates you are talking about include the $100,000,000 that Senator HALE, of Maine, and the President cut down in the appropriation bills one day in fifteen minutes over in the White House?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman from Missouri is now either speaking from his recollection of what he has read, or from his imagination, because I never heard of anything of the kind.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you what I am reading from. Senator HALE went over there to see the President and walked out, and that bunch of reporters that stay over there tackled him, and he said, with a great deal of pomposity, that he and the President had just cut down the appropriations for this year $100,000,000. That is what the newspaper fellows said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has expired.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I want to ask unanimous consent for two minutes more—that the gentleman from Minnesota be given two minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] may have two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] stated the question properly, that he, the gentleman from Minnesota, in a speech in Chicago said that the appropriations now for the current fiscal year for taking care of the army would amount to 72 per cent, while agriculture only got 2 per cent?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The current fiscal year.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not say anything about agriculture. I intend to pay my respects to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, further along in the session, by giving the exact statement I did make, and also exact figures as to our expenditures. What I said at Chicago on the 5th of last May was that up to this time, during that fiscal year, we had been expending on account of wars we are preparing for and wars we have, of our revenues, exclusive of postal receipts, at the rate of 72 per cent, and I cited the statement of the Treasury of the day before to prove my statement.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking some questions of the chairman of the committee. I want to know about these cabinetmakers, what they are, and what they are used for in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Agriculture occupies a number of buildings, and repairs are frequently necessary. Cases for the accommodation of specimens in the museum or for the use of laboratories need frequently either to be made or be repaired, and the provision is therefore made for carpenters and cabinetmakers, painters, and other mechanics on the roll of the department in order that that work may be done promptly and well.

Mr. MORSE. And these carpenters are also used in keeping in repair the buildings? There seems to be quite a number of them, some 13 or 14, I believe.

Mr. SCOTT. There are quite a number of them. It is a big department.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is not a fact that you have provided here for 11 new carpenters?

Mr. SCOTT. It appears so on the face of the provision, but they are not new men, because they are simply transferred from the different bureaus. Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] until the present year each bureau has had its own force of mechanics.

The appropriations, I might add further, for paying them were included in the appropriations for the respective bureaus, but it appeared to the committee if this force of mechanics could be concentrated and all put under the direction of the Secretary or his chief clerk, it would work for economy, because then if carpenter work or painting or cabinet work were needed in any bureau, the chief could make a requisition upon the Secretary, and then a mechanic could be detailed to do that work. The report which the Secretary makes shows that we were right in that assumption, and there is actually less money required under that system than under the old.

Mr. BUTLER. There has been no increase?

Mr. SCOTT. There has been no increase.

Mr. MORSE. I see here two plumbers, at $840 each, and one plumber's helper. Does it require five plumbers to keep the plumbing of these buildings in repair during the year?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the committee is of the opinion that the Secretary would not estimate for more men than were needed. There is a great deal of plumbing to be done in the large number of buildings occupied by the department, and I think it is entirely likely they require the entire time of five men.

Mr. MORSE. Are they kept busy during the whole year or just called in when needed?

Mr. SCOTT. They are employed during the whole year.

Mr. BARNHART. I will ask the chairman of the committee, is it the custom of committees to accept the estimates of the chiefs of departments without question, as you have in this plumbing matter?

Mr. SCOTT. Not without question. The committee over which I have the honor to preside—I can not speak for any other—always does question very closely the chiefs of the various bureaus before making up the bill.

Mr. BARNHART. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he stated a few minutes ago that the Secretary would not have asked for them unless he needed them, and gave us no information as to whether he did in fact need them.

Mr. SCOTT. The chief clerk was asked all the questions in reference to employees and mechanics of the various grades, and stated that they were able under the concentration that has been made possible by last year's legislation to dismiss several employees who had heretofore been employed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I do this for the purpose of replying briefly to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota and to his criticism of the resolution which I read; and I want to try to show the futility of the plan that he himself, as nearly as I could gather it, suggests. I believe this is a matter of enough importance to occupy the attention of the House for a few minutes.

I am heartily pleased that the gentleman from Minnesota said that even in a general way he approved the suggestion that is embodied in my resolution. He speaks of these various committees authorized to make appropriations as "representatives" of the different departments. I submit, and I have no doubt that he agrees that they are not only the representatives but the advocates of those departments. They come here imbued with the importance of their own committee and the activities they represent. They set forth wisely and in a statesmanlike way the necessities of those departments, and the result is that they come upon the floor of the House constantly advocating greater and greater appropriations for their departments.

As I understand the gentleman's plan, it is to create one great committee of this House "on appropriations" which shall have charge of all of these matters. But how is he going to do it? Where is he going to get the votes in this House to pass any such amendment to the rules as that, when we know as well as he knows that every member of the Committees on Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, Agriculture, and all these other ten or twelve committees that have the right to report appropriations to the House, every one of them, from top to bottom, and all their membership, will rise up here in opposition to any such plan. Now, according to my plan you avoid that parliamentary difficulty.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Surely, I will; the more we talk about this matter the better.

Mr. TAWNEY. Wherein can you draw the distinction between taking from the committee jurisdiction of making appropriations, and taking away from them the aggregate of the revenues, if necessary, for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the department of which you say they are the advocates?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think I can answer that emphatically and clearly, so that any Member of the House can understand it.

This Committee on Estimates and Expenditures will become the mouthpiece of this House upon this whole question of appropriations, so that instead of the gentleman from Minnesota standing here alone, as he is compelled to now, to-day and every day combating with all his power extravagant appropriations, as he sees fit to designate them, he would have a solid phalanx of the leading men of this House standing with him keeping the expenses of this House within the estimates. That is one great advantage of it. In the next place there is this point: That we will have, at the beginning of the session, set forth before the House in the report of this committee, a full view of all the probable and possible revenues of the Government, but in addition the apportionment of them among the various committees. This apportionment need not necessarily be binding ultimately upon the House, but will at least be a warning to the various committees having the right to report appropriations that they can not, without criticism of the House, exceed the amount allotted to them.

Consequently this House will have a chance to say at the beginning of the year, "We will increase the appropriation here and cut it down there," instead of having such a situation as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has described as happening at this session, when the Committee on Military Affairs, advocating the claims of the War Department, has asked and secured appropriations actually exceeding the estimates of that department.

In other words, the gentleman from Minnesota admits what I think we all must admit, that if this House is to maintain its prerogative of control over the public purse we must do what the Senate has already done and appoint a committee, a new committee, and one having the confidence of the House by reason of the character and experience of the men upon it, who will at the begining of each session lay before the House a plan, a budget, call it what you will, of revenue and appropriations, which we can consider, criticise, and change as we will.

I submit to the gentlemen of the House that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TAWNEY] has already said enough to show that he understands the difficulties of our situation and appreciates the fact that some such remedy as that proposed in this resolution must ultimately be adopted or we will lose that control of appropriations which is essentially our prerogative in this Chamber.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to state that the military bill this year exceeds the estimates.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I said that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had so stated.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to make that statement on his own responsibility.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all; I simply quoted what he had said.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman if he recognizes the fact that there are such things as supplemental estimates?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is quite possible.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And we had supplemental estimates.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 404. An act for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia.

S. 183. An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and make appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 5040. An act to authorize Bonners Ferry Bridge Commission to construct a bridge across the Kootenai River at Bonners Ferry, Idaho.

S. 4891. An act to extend the time for the commencement and completion of a railroad bridge across the Kansas River at or near Kansas City, Kans., in the county of Wyandotte, State of Kansas.

S. 3318. An act to legalize a bridge across the Snake River between the States of Idaho and Oregon.

S. J. Res. 55. Joint resolution authorizing the postponement of the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 23.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound in one volume 16,500 copies of the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Laird Shoup, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 shall be for the use and distribution by the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Idaho. The joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure a suitable copper-process plate of the statue to be bound with these memorials.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For telephone rentals and for telegraphing, telephoning, and cabling reports and messages, rates to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture by agreements with the companies performing the service, $265,200.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture two or three questions. I notice in lines 12, 13, and 14 there is an appropriation for telephoning and telegraphing. I wish to know what rate, as compared with the commercial rate, the Government pays for telegraphing.

Mr. SCOTT. The Weather Bureau pays a very low rate, indeed, compared with the ordinary commercial rate. My recollection, offhand, is that it pays at the rate of 1 cent a word for messages of 10 words not exceeding a distance of 200 miles, and perhaps a slight increase when the distance is increased; but it uses a code in the transmission of its messages, whereby words are saved and a whole phrase is put in one code word, so that the enormous amount of telegraphing which the Weather Bureau does really costs the Government very little.

Mr. MORSE. If I recall, there has been a recent rule adopted by the telegraph companies with regard to the rates for code messages. Does the gentleman know whether the rate has been increased to the Government as it has been to private individuals?

Mr. SCOTT. I can only answer for the Weather Bureau; but that question was asked the Chief of the Weather Bureau and he said that his contract continues for a number of years yet, so that any changes which the companies may have made do not affect the rates of this bureau.

Mr. MORSE. Would it be proper to incorporate into the RECORD a copy of the contract between the companies and the Weather Bureau for the Government?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. MORSE. I ask the chairman of the committee to place in to-morrow's RECORD, if possible, a copy of the contracts between the telephone and telegraph companies and the Government, showing the charges made for the service rendered.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman refer to the Government generally, or to the Weather Bureau?

Mr. MORSE. I refer to the Weather Bureau.

Mr. SCOTT. If I can obtain that contract, I will be glad to accede to the gentleman's request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Weather Bureau, $1,523,260.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A number of my people are interested in the establishment of a Weather Bureau station at Newbern, N. C. I have introduced a bill for that purpose. We are in the midst of a great trucking section of the country. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this bill includes any amount for the establishment of Weather Bureau stations, and what is being done in that direction, and what is the policy of the Weather Bureau and the Department of Agriculture with reference to the establishment of Weather Bureau stations?

Mr. SCOTT. This bill does not include or provide for any establishment of new Weather Bureau stations. It is the policy of the bureau to establish stations when and where the commercial interests of the country seem to demand it, or where the station is needed in order to promote the accuracy of the weather forecasts.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. May I ask, are these Weather Bureau stations appropriated for separately, or are the appropriations made in a lump sum?

Mr. SCOTT. It has been the custom always to carry the appropriation for new bureau stations in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In a lump sum or for the stations separately specified?

Mr. SCOTT. The stations are separately specified; for instance, in the appropriation bill of two years ago we made appropriations for a new station at Richmond, Va., and two or three other places.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. But no provision is made for any new Weather Bureau stations in this bill?

Mr. SCOTT. No.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Why has no provision been made in this bill for the establishment of new Weather Bureau stations?

Mr. SCOTT. The principal reason, perhaps, was because the estimates did not provide for it. The committee did not feel itself warranted in recommending an appropriation for a new station for which there was no estimate. Another reason is that even if such an estimate had been made the chances are that the committee would have thought it better to wait until the emergency of the Treasury is a little less acute.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. So the policy of economy had something to do with not making any appropriation for new Weather Bureau stations this year?

Mr. SCOTT. It undoubtedly had a great deal to do with it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice that you are providing for the payment of $40,000 to maintain a printing office for the Weather Bureau. Do the copies of bulletins and circulars included in this item contain the predictions of the weather?

Mr. SCOTT. Some of them contain predictions. There are a number of publications issued from the printing office of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not criticize the gentleman because he can not answer my question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Kansas understood the question. The charts do not contain the predictions, they contain the actual results—the meteorological data that is furnished the bureau.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to make a statement?

Mr. BUTLER. I will try to make my question plain. Can the gentleman tell me what proportion of this appropriation is used to distribute the forecasts of the department? Is that plain?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman's question is plain and the former question was plain enough. I am not able to say what amount of the appropriation is used in scattering the predictions. In a general way I am able to say that in the main the predictions are published through the Associated Press and through the news agency without any cost to the bureau.

Mr. BUTLER. It is gratifying to me to know that distribution of the predictions costs but little. Has the gentleman ever been able to ascertain what proportion of these weather predictions are verified?

Mr. SCOTT. The chief of the bureau in answer to a question replied that 85 per cent, on an average, of the predictions are verified.

Mr. BUTLER. That is all. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. I have evidence before me that one successful prediction in a single instance resulted in the saving of 3,000 lives.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not complaining at all; if they saved one-third of a life it is worth all the money they cost. The reason I made the inquiry was to know whether or not the department could applaud itself for accuracy.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to say that it is not the department alone that applauds the department. I hold in my hand a pamphlet of some 50 pages, filled with complimentary resolutions adopted by different boards of trade and other organizations.

Mr. BUTLER. I will be pleased to read it some day.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 editor and compiler, $2,000; 4 clerks, class 4; 5 clerks, class 3; 17 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 15 clerks, class 1; 14 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 3 clerks, at $840 each; 5 clerks, at $720 each; 1 clerk, $700; 1 instrument maker, $1,200; 1 architect, $1,400; 1 messenger and custodian, $1,000; 3 messengers, at $840 each; 4 messengers, at $720 each; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 messenger boy, $360; 1 skilled laborer, $840; 1 skilled laborer, $720; 2 skilled laborers, at $600 each; 1 skilled laborer, $660 each; 1 illustrator, $1,400; 4 laborers, at $600 each; 2 laborers, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $540; 6 charwomen, at $480 each; 2 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $115,920.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to find out from the chairman of the committee if this bill carries any money for compensating people whose cattle are killed because infected with tuberculosis.

Mr. SCOTT. The bill does not in terms carry any such provision. It does, however, provide sums out of which a fair proportion of the cost growing out of the slaughter of animals in order to stamp out some contagious disease may be paid. For instance, when we had the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease in four or five States a year ago several herds were slaughtered upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, and the department bore about one-third of the expense, the local communities bearing the other two-thirds. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], remarked to me just now that there was a deficiency brought in for the consideration of his committee to provide for the payment of losses growing out of tuberculosis.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Kansas will permit, I will call his attention to lines 19 and 20, on page 11. Six hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars are appropriated, and a part of that may be expended for that purpose.

Mr. SCOTT. No; I do not think any part of it could be expended for that purpose. I will call the attention of the gentleman to lines 5 and 7, on the same page, where there is a provision "to purchase or destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same," and it is under that provision that I think a fair proportion of the expense may be borne.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would ask if the words he has read, "to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals," and so forth, followed by the words "as follows," and then following the next paragraph, which makes the appropriation, would not make the appropriation, or as much thereof as may be necessary, available for the payment for animals that were slaughtered on account of disease? My attention has been called to this before, when a deficiency estimate was before the Committee on Appropriations at the extra session of this Congress.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, has this section been read yet?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; and I have moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understood they had not reached that part on page 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The last section read is the one ending in line 14 on page 9.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then, this is not before the House as yet.

Mr. LAMB. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I hope now that I may be allowed to say what I want to say. Just about the time that Congress convened, it was published in the Washington newspapers that the dairy herds in and around the District of Columbia were infected with tuberculosis, but that the tuberculosis herds had not been killed because there was not appropriation out of which the owners could be compensated. It was discovered, however, about that time that there was some appropriation, a small appropriation, which could be made available for this purpose, and hence as far as the appropriation would hold out they proceeded to exterminate the infected cattle. What occurred to me was this, Why should the Government pay for killing an infected, diseased cow? If the cow is infected with tuberculosis, no man with any milk of human kindness in him would offer her to a butcher or would sell milk from her.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I hope I may be allowed a little while longer, as my time was taken up by others.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be recognized for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if a cow was diseased it was no longer fit for beef, and no longer fit to be a part of a dairy herd, and the owner ought to be thankful if that fact is brought to his attention and gladly slaughter the cow in the interests of humanity. I am sure that if a government expert would come upon my place and point out to me cows that were infected with tuberculosis, I would slaughter them and thank the Government for the service that it had performed, and ask no compensation whatever.

What is the cow worth, and why should we appropriate money to pay for it? The only thing of any value is the hide, and that the owner gets when the animal is slaughtered.

Mr. MOSS. Is it not a fact that a few of those herds slaughtered in the District of Columbia under the inspection of the Government they afterwards sell the carcass with the consent of the Government——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I hope not.

Mr. MOSS. I can state that is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then I will join the anti-meat league if that is the fact.

Mr. MOSS. That is true; there is no question; and not only that, but I have it on the authority of some gentleman from the Agricultural Department that in some cases of those slaughtered they only condemn part of the animal and allow the parts not condemned to be sold.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly we ought not to pay for that which is condemned. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It seems to me this question as to whether the Government should pay a large sum of money for diseased cattle that certainly are worthless deserves a reply from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I made no reply because the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina did not seem to call for one particularly, and because no amendment was offered to the bill. There is a reply which seems to me to be adequate. It is not strictly true to say that these cows which are affected with tuberculosis are worthless. It has been pretty clearly shown that the tubercle bacilli are not carried in the milk of these cows. It has been shown with clearness that the calves coming from these cows do not inherit the disease. The milk is only contaminated after it leaves the cow, and it may be kept pure with proper safeguards. The calf from a tuberculous cow may be taken away from her and surrounded by healthful influences and live to maturity, so that it is not true to say that the herds are worthless. In the second place, it is true, as I believe was just suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, that tuberculous cattle are slaughtered and they pass a part of the carcass because it may not be infected in the least with the bacilli, and they condemn that which is so infected.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Is there any statute authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. Unless it might be the general statute creating the Bureau of Animal Industry, which I have not read for a year or two—and I would not be able to state from recollection—but I am disposed to think that the language of the statute is broad enough to authorize the Secretary to take such action as he deems best to eradicate these contagious diseases.

Mr. CARLIN. Have you the statute before you?

Mr. SCOTT. I believe I have.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like you to read that portion which you claim justifies this appropriation.

Mr. SCOTT. I dislike to keep the House waiting, and if I can have unanimous consent to do so I will ask to pass this matter for the present, with the understanding that we can go back to it when the gentleman from Virginia desires to do so.

Mr. CARLIN. I very much prefer to determine it now, because I want to raise the point of order——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that this part of the bill we are discussing has not been read, it is not open to an amendment or the point of order or anything, except questions have been asked——

Mr. SCOTT. I confess my attention has been diverted, and I have not been able to follow the reading of the bill carefully, and I assumed——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This matter is on page 11.

Mr. SCOTT. I assumed that the gentlemen who were talking were directing their remarks to the subject immediately under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no time myself, but I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I desire to say I offered an amendment to strike out one word in the first section of the bill relating to the Bureau of Animal Industry. I do not know just where this appropriation is in the bill, but I wanted to call it to the attention of the committee at this time so that when we did reach it Members would know something about it.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question: How much money has been expended under that appropriation, wherever it is and whatever it is, in paying for diseased cattle?

Mr. SCOTT. During the fiscal year ending 1909 there was something like $400,000, as I now recall it—and the gentleman will appreciate I am speaking from a recollection of something that happened over a year ago—under authority of this provision, to pay part of the expense of slaughtering herds in Pennsylvania, New York, and Wisconsin and one or two other States where there had been a vicious outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. There has been no report made to the committee of the amount expended under this provision during the present fiscal year, and we do not know whether any amount has been expended, because reports are not made until the close of the year.

Mr. MOSS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MOSS. Is it not a fact that so far as tuberculosis is concerned, the spending of the money at the present time is just going on here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SCOTT. There has been some work in other parts of the country. The gentleman may remember that for two or three years the bill has contained a provision authorizing the department to investigate the prevalence of tuberculosis in various parts of the country, and that investigation has been carried on, but I think no herds have been slaughtered; at least the department has not paid the expense or any part of the expense of slaughtering any animals, outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MOSS. I made a personal investigation at the department and was informed by the officials there that, so far as tuberculosis was concerned, we have been conducting the examination only in the District of Columbia, because here alone did Congress have the right, under the law, to act.

Mr. SCOTT. I think that statement is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Following up the interrogatory of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON], I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture if he can differentiate between the amount used for purchasing and the amount used for slaughtering cattle? How much is paid to the owner of the cattle that are slaughtered, as differing from the amount paid for the slaughtering process?

Mr. SCOTT. I think these words are construed together, and I interpret it to mean the purchase for the purpose of slaughtering.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Could you advise us, when the cattle are purchased for the purpose of slaughtering, the current price paid by the department?

Mr. SCOTT. My recollection of that is that when it has been decided to slaughter a herd appraisers are called in and the value is fixed, usually under the law of the State, and the amount agreed upon by these appraisers is the amount paid.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To a certain extent, then, it is a matter of barter and sale as between the department and the owner before the slaughter actually takes place?

Mr. SCOTT. To an extent, yes; except the owner is obliged to sell.

If there are no further questions, I hope the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

January 26, 1910:

H. R. 9570. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey certain lands to the city of Biloxi, Miss., for street purposes.

January 27, 1910:

H. R. 13832. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 12140. An act to extend the time for Ashley County, Ark., to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew at a point near Morrell;

H. R. 12288. An act to authorize the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said city;

H. R. 13872. An act to authorize the counties of Bradley and McMinn, Tenn., by authority of their county courts, to construct a bridge across the Hiwassee River at Charleston and Calhoun, in said counties;

H. R. 14496. An act to authorize the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said city;

H. R. 15815. An act authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge across the Rio Grande River between Laredo, Tex., and Nuevo Laredo, Republic of Mexico; and

H. R. 16388. An act to authorize the Monongahela Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Monongahela River between Fayette and Greene counties, Pa.

January 28, 1910:

H. R. 16223. An act extending the time for certain homesteaders to establish residence upon their lands;

H. R. 5463. An act to provide for a change in the bridge authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the building of a bridge at Dardanelle, Ark.," approved September 30, 1890;

H. R. 12138. An act to extend the time for Ashley County, Ark., to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew at Portland;

H. R. 12139. An act to extend the time for Ashley County, Ark., to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew at Wilmot;

H. R. 15387. An act authorizing the town of Bass Brook to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Itasca County, Minn.; and

H. R. 13831. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry: For carrying out the provisions of the act approved May 29, 1884, establishing a bureau of animal industry, and the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1891, providing for the safe transport and humane treatment of export cattle from the United States to foreign countries, and for other purposes; the act approved August 30, 1890, providing for the importation of animals into the United States, and for other purposes; and the provisions of the act of May 9, 1902, extending the inspection of meats to process butter, and providing for the inspection of factories, marking of packages, etc.; and the provisions of the act approved February 2, 1903, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more effectually suppress and prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes; and also the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1905, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts, to permit and regulate the movement of cattle and other live stock therefrom, and for other purposes; and for the enforcement of section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States;" and for carrying out the provisions of the act of June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation;" and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and disseminate information concerning live-stock, dairy, and other animal products; to prepare and disseminate reports on animal industry; to employ and pay from the appropriation herein made as many persons in the city of Washington or elsewhere as he may deem necessary; to purchase in the open market samples of all tuberculin serums, antitoxins, or analogous products, of foreign or domestic manufacture, which are sold in the United States; for the detection, prevention, treatment, or cure of diseases of domestic animals, to test the same and to disseminate the results of said tests in such manner as he may deem best; to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same whenever in his judgment essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another, as follows.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise a point of order. I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee what particular duty will the Department of Agriculture have in enforcing section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909?

Mr. SCOTT. Section 62 reads as follows:

Whoever shall forcibly assault, resist, oppose, prevent, impede, or interfere with any officer or employee of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture in the execution of his duties, or on account of the execution of his duties, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and whoever shall use any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting any officer or employee of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture in the execution of his duties, with intent to commit a bodily injury upon him or to deter or prevent him from discharging his duties, or on account of the performance of his duties, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The enforcement of that provision of the penal code devolves upon the United States district attorneys, does it not?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; I think it has been in some cases. I can easily see how it would happen that this bureau would be put to expense in securing evidence, or in travel of the employee, perhaps, who might have been assaulted; and my recollection is that the Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that in such a case the expenses should be paid by the bureau rather than by the Department of Justice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this practice were to be followed out as to every provision in the penal code, most of the appropriations for the Department of Justice would necessarily be made in other departments of the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, I think that these lines ought to be stricken out. I will say, with all due respect to the gentleman from Kansas, that the case cited here, and the one that he refers to, where the Comptroller made the rulling, are not at all analogous. It is true that the urgent deficiency appropriation bill carried at this session an appropriation of $50,000 to the Department of Agriculture to defray the expenses of certain suits that had been brought under the pure-food act.

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the pure-food act, on which the Comptroller of the Treasury made his ruling, expressly provides that the expense of the administration of the pure-food act shall be borne by the Department of Agriculture; hence the Department of Justice could not subpœna the expert witnesses necessary in the trial of those cases and pay them out of their appropriations, because the law imposes upon the Agricultural Department the duty of defraying all expenses incident to the prosecution of those cases; and for that reason we gave the Agricultural Department $50,000 to meet an expenditure which is authorized and the department is required to make, and which the Comptroller has held the Department of Justice can not make. But this is an entirely different proposition. This is a general law, a penal statute, which the Department of Justice, when called upon by any department of the Government, is required to enforce, and to prosecute any case that may arise under it, even to subpœnaing witnesses and defraying their expenses.

I think it would be a mistake to institute a policy of putting on any particular department of the Government the responsibility and the expense incident to the enforcement of any provision of the penal code. It is only because the pure-food act expressly places upon the Department of Agriculture the expense necessary to the enforcement and administration of that law that the Comptroller has held that the department must bear that expense out of its own appropriation. The general appropriation for the Bureau of Chemistry was not sufficient to meet that expense, and for that reason, at this session of Congress, we have made a deficiency appropriation. I do not think the gentleman ought really to insist upon that paragraph remaining in the bill. It is unnecessary, clearly unnecessary, and it might result in establishing a bad precedent.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not at all disposed to insist upon that language remaining in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. For the information of the Chair, will the gentleman indicate the lines to which his point of order lies?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Page 10, lines 12 to 15.

Mr. SCOTT. These lines were inserted, Mr. Chairman, upon the recommendation of the solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, and we presumed he considered the provision to be necessary because of the ruling to which the gentleman from Minnesota has just referred in relation to the Bureau of Chemistry. Prior to this year the expenses of the Bureau of Chemistry in the matter of getting evidence in pure-food prosecutions have been borne by the Department of Justice, but this year the Comptroller of the Treasury made a ruling that the expenses must be defrayed by the Bureau of Chemistry, I presume on account of the provision of the pure-food law to which the gentleman from Minnesota has alluded. Inasmuch as it appears that these cases are on a different basis, I am disposed to agree to the suggestion that the lines may as well go out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply want to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that if this practice should be adopted every department of the Government would be asking appropriations to enable them to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and it would be utterly impossible to have any system.

Mr. SCOTT. I quite agree with the gentleman; it would be a bad practice.

Mr. TAWNEY. If this language remains in the bill it will make it impossible for the Department of Justice to bear any part of the expense incident to the enforcement of the law out of the appropriations made for the expenses of the Department of Justice.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to amend the bill on page 10, by striking out the following language——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make his point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order against this language.

Mr. SCOTT. I will concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I offer an amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas, chairman of the committee, who had arisen to address the Chair. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SCOTT. I only desired to make sure that the Clerk had the right language.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let the Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 12, after the word "purposes," strike out "and for the enforcement of section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.'"

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 11, strike out "purchase and;" after "diseased," strike out "or" and insert "and to purchase and destroy."

Mr. SCOTT. Let it be read as it will be if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

To destroy diseased and to purchase and destroy exposed animals.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, we certainly have received some startling information from the Committee on Agriculture to-day. In the first place, I think it will fill most of us with surprise to be informed by the department having in charge the enforcement of the pure-food law that milk from tuberculous cattle can safely and profitably be fed to babes, and that the meat of tuberculous cattle can profitably be eaten by ourselves. It may be so, but considering the efforts made to crush out tuberculosis in every form, it is rather startling to be told that, although an animal is infected, it is still safe to feed its milk not only to adults but also to infants, and that its meat may also be eaten.

Of course the amendment which I have offered does not bear upon that, because we are also told, in answer to the question put by the gentleman from South Carolina, that where an animal is diseased and should be destroyed it is also paid for. Therefore it can have no value. It can not be possible that we will take the position that a man should be allowed to keep, to use, to sell a diseased animal filled with contagion for another animal or full of peril to those who may use its meat or milk. It can not be possible that such an animal as that has a commercial value which this Government will recognize, and that when it destroys that animal for the promotion of the public health it will at the same time turn around and say, "We will destroy your diseased and worthless cattle, that must be destroyed for purposes of health, and yet we will pay you for them such sum as may be agreed upon." We all know that where these agreements are made between some representative of the Government and the owner of the herd, the Government gets the worst of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman believe the Government of the United States would have the right to destroy the cattle of some person in one of the States?

Mr. PERKINS. No; but it can in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would be true, but the number of cattle that might be affected in this District would be insignificant, while the number throughout the country might be very large.

Mr. PERKINS. The Government of the United States would have jurisdiction in the Territories or in Alaska, where there may not be many cattle now, but where there may be at some future time. If the principle is wrong, it does not seem to me we should authorize it. I have endeavored to draw this amendment with care, because I can see that cattle that have been exposed to contagion may be entirely sound to-day.

A cow or ox which has been exposed may yet be sound, and if the Government comes in and destroys a sound animal in order to prevent the possibility that it may develop the disease later that animal should be paid for. The amendment provides that those cattle that are actually diseased and that certainly can have no value shall be destroyed. In reference to exposed cattle which it may be necessary to destroy to prevent the possibility of the extension of the disease, the amendment provides that the Government may purchase and destroy them. That is entirely just to the owner of any herd if he is paid for the cattle that may be exposed but still unaffected by the disease and is not paid for those that are already diseased.

Mr. WEISSE. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if this bill covers the States or just the Territories and the District of Columbia.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Wisconsin will have to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. WEISSE. I mean the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, my amendment strikes out the words that I find in the bill which authorizes the purchase of diseased cattle. It gives the Government the power to destroy them, but not to purchase.

Mr. WEISSE. In Wisconsin we have a state law that allows us to destroy the cattle which we test and find diseased, and the State pays two-thirds of the value of the cattle that are diseased, and by that means we have got rid of tuberculosis.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman what in his State is regarded as the value of an animal which is afflicted with tuberculosis?

Mr. WEISSE. They place a limit to the amount that can be paid for any one animal. This refers to registered stock, which is very high in price. I have a Holstein cow worth $10,000. In my district the State would pay about $70 for this cow if killed, but the average value is taken up by a board of three disinterested persons, who appraise the value of the cow.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me ask the gentleman, would the gentleman himself buy an animal afflicted with tuberculosis for 5 cents?

Mr. WEISSE. This test is made by the state veterinarian. I can not tell just exactly how the test is made, but they inject into these cattle antitoxin.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. Tuberculin.

Mr. WEISSE. Tuberculin, as the gentleman from Indiana says; and as soon as they discover that the cattle are diseased a board composed of three persons appraise the value, and the State pays two-thirds of the value of the cattle. After killed they are then taken to the slaughterhouse and the farmer is allowed the hide and other offal, so to speak, and what is left is burned up or destroyed.

Mr. PERKINS. I have bought cows myself, but I never would have been willing to pay 10 cents for a cow that was diseased.

Mr. WEISSE. Our State will not allow a cow to come into it without being tested, and that is one thing that has made us the leading dairy State in the West. If you buy cheese or butter made in Wisconsin you know you get it free from tuberculosis, for you get it from cows that have been tested. The Holstein cow that holds the world's record for milk giving is owned in my district by W. L. Gillette, Rosendale, Wis.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that this appropriation is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late. The question has been debated for some time. Debate having been had on the merits, the Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. But I made the point of order at the first, and the gentleman in charge of the bill said that he wished I would reserve it until later.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia is correct; he did call my attention to the fact that he desired to make a point of order, and the Chair will remember that I asked him if he would be willing to let the matter rest until we could look up the law. As far as the committee is concerned I would be willing to waive that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's attention was not called to the point of order until the gentleman just now raised it.

Mr. CARLIN. I ask unanimous consent to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Virginia reserved the point of order, the Chair will entertain it now.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee for some information on one part of this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. BOOHER. I would be glad if the gentleman from Virginia would withhold his point of order for a moment.

Mr. CARLIN. I will withhold it for a moment.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a part of this paragraph, on page 10, line 24, which says:

> To purchase in the open market samples of all tuberculin serums, antitoxins, or analogous products, of foreign or domestic manufacture, which are sold in the United States, for the detection, prevention, treatment, or cure of diseases of domestic animals, to test the same and to disseminate the results of said tests in such manner as he may deem best.

I want to ask the gentleman if that covers the case where a man has invented or manufactured a medicine for the cure of scabies or the killing of ticks on sheep and the Government takes charge of this medicine, goes to the stock yards in different parts of the country, and experiments with the medicine and kills a great number of sheep. Is the Government responsible for the value of the sheep thus killed? The whole business is in charge of the government experts; they are there dipping the sheep, and the sheep die from the effects of the medicine. Is there any provision in this bill for paying them anything?

Mr. SCOTT. I am not a lawyer; but I presume that if the Government took possession of a number of sheep, in order to make an experiment with them, and the sheep died, the owner would undoubtedly have a good cause of action.

Mr. BOOHER. I am not talking about the cause of action. I want to state the facts of a particular case as I understand it and get the opinion of the chairman, in whose fairness and judgment I have implicit confidence.

Mr. SCOTT. And I think, as a matter of fact, that the department, under the authority given in this bill, could compensate the owner without any act.

Mr. BOOHER. If it does not come under this section, is there any provision of the bill that would cover it?

Mr. SCOTT. It would come under the general provisions of the paragraph authorizing the Secretary to make investigations looking to the extermination of contagious diseases and to the protection of the cattle of the country.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to say to the chairman of the committee that I know that has been done at one of the stock yards of this country, at least. The government experts went to the stock yards and took charge of the sheep. The farmers and the feeders go to the stock yards and buy numbers of sheep. They are taken in charge by the government experts. They are put through this dipping process and then are shipped out, and I know one gentleman who lost nearly 25 per cent of the sheep that he bought—something like 600. The government experts were notified that the sheep were dying. They went to the farm of the purchaser and examined them and told the farmer——

Mr. TAWNEY. They could not experiment with the sheep without the consent of the owner.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; but they did without his consent, I beg to state to the gentleman. When a man goes to the stock yards and buys sheep, under the law, if they have been shipped from another State, they have to go through this process. The man has nothing to say about it. The Government takes charge of the sheep and dips them. The purchaser may not be there and may know nothing whatever about it. The purchaser can not get them out of the stock yards until they are dipped. Now, the Government uses a new remedy that has never been used in the place before. The commission man who sells the sheep is not liable and the owner who ships them is not liable, and yet I find no provision in the bill to take care of this kind of a case, unless it comes within the paragraph we are now discussing.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman know what procedure has been followed in the matter?

Mr. BOOHER. I only know that the farmers, so I have been informed, when they asked the government expert who would pay them for this loss, were told that he did not think that they could get any pay at all. The commission man is not responsible; the stock-yard company deny responsibility; the shipper is not responsible. The new remedy is used, an entirely new remedy; it is an experiment; the government expert is there making the experiment; the sheep are shipped after they go through this process; and when they are delivered they are dying; and, as I say, one gentleman lost nearly 25 per cent of a number of sheep that he purchased—something like 600. It is a great loss, and if there is no provision in this bill to provide for it, I would like the chairman of the committee, if he could, to call the attention of this bureau to the fact and see what could be done in regard to it.

Mr. SCOTT. I would be very glad to inquire what is done in such cases.

Mr. BOOHER. Whether any report has been made in respect to it. This experiment was made at the stock yards in St. Joseph, Mo. I do not object to the Government making these experiments, but I think when loss occurs there should be compensation to owners of the stock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia on his point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is against that part beginning on line 5, beginning with the words "to purchase and destroy" and from there down to the words "as follows," the point of order being that it is not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order to the paragraph as it reads before the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS]?

Mr. CARLIN. Either before or after, it does not make any difference.

The CHAIRMAN. To that portion of the paragraph?

Mr. CARLIN. The Chair understands the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. I would suggest that the point of order should be disposed of before voting upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, because if the Chair holds with the gentleman from Virginia, the amendment will have nothing upon which to rest.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; the amendment would go out also.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would suggest also to the gentleman that he would not include the words "as follows" in his point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. I did not. I said down to those words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the chairman of the committee for the statute authorizing the purchase and destruction of diseased cattle.

Mr. CARLIN. If the Chair will permit, I was going to state that the chairman of the committee holds that is authorized under section 2 of the act of May 29, 1884, at page 99. My point is that that section simply creates and directs the Commissioner of Agriculture to appoint two competent agents, and defines the duties of those agents with reference to certain investigations. It does not authorize the purchase or destruction of any animal, though it does authorize the employment of those agents.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any statute other than the section referred to authorizing the purchase and destruction of diseased animals. Section 3 has been referred to. It reads:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extipation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to cooperate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State of Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to cooperate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease from one State or Territory into another.

Mr. CARLIN. I call the Chair's attention to the fact that this refers to the treatment and the elimination of the disease and not of the animal.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, does it not often happen that the only way you can eliminate a disease is to eliminate the animal?

Mr. CARLIN. Not at all. We have laws regulating and governing the treatment of tuberculosis in human beings, and I have never yet had the idea that it involved the elimination of the individual.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will hardly insist the cases are parallel——

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman sees no distinction between individuals and animals.

Mr. CARLIN. I think there is a distinction between the treatment of disease and extermination, and I see a distinction——

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to call the attention of the Chair to the language in section 2 of the act from which he has just read, on page 99, where—

The Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents who shall, under the instructions of the commissioner, examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other dangerous, contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

Now, if in order to provide against the spread of those other diseases it becomes necessary in the judgment of the Secretary to purchase and destroy animals, it rather seems to me that this paragraph gives him authority to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say when before the Committee on Appropriations the last session of Congress in support of the deficiency items on this appropriation the question arose as to what authority the department had for the destruction of the animals supposed to be diseased or animals supposed to be exposed to disease, and the Secretary of Agriculture, the head of the department, put it squarely upon the authority under the general quarantine power of the Agricultural Department; and that power, he says, has never been questioned, even by the courts or by anyone else. I have the statement made before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Minnesota cite the Chair to that authority?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not cite it, as I have not got anything relating to that, but the general quarantine power the department has under the general law is the authority which the Secretary of Agriculture claims they possess that authorizes them to exercise the functions they did with respect to the purchase and destruction of animals. They do not attempt to destroy until they purchase. They have no power to do that, because you can not take property of a private individual for government account without compensation, but the power to purchase for the prevention of the spread of disease is one that he recognizes as being within the general quarantine power of the department. Here is what was said:

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Supposing you were to quarantine New York, Michigan, Maryland and Pennsylvania, and you said to those States: "Unless you do something to help us check this disease we will just keep your line guarded and will not let a cow out or in for the next ten years or until your cattle die?"

Secretary WILSON. You could do that, but if you let that disease get a real hold on any one State, then the birds, the dogs, the tramps, and the Lord knows what all will carry it all over the United States in less than five years. That is where the trouble is. You have never had it down South. They have had it west of Chicago, and this prompt work is what saves you and the West both.

The CHAIRMAN. Your powers of quarantine, however, would admit of your doing what Mr. LIVINGSTON suggests?

Secretary WILSON. Sure; that is all we could do for them. If they should say, "We will not do a thing to aid the Federal Government," then we would say, "All right, gentlemen, we will shut you up, and you shall not ship out a single thing to carry that contagion," but it would get out just the same.
